by forming a museum which is the most important collection of Celtic antiquities in the world. In connection with that museum a catalogue has been formed by Sir William Wilde illustrating these collections. This work, involving a serious inroad on the time of a professional man, has been quite gratuitous; and he (Mr. Gregory) would venture to notice it as a work most amusing and interesting in itself, but invaluable to the student of Irish antiquities. This work, he regretted to say, was unfinished, and at a stand-still for want of funds to print it, although the MS. is complete. Then, as a scientific institution, besides the encouragement which the Academy gave by having papers of merit read before its meetings and printed, it had published a series of tidal and meteorological observations round the coast of Ireland of very considerable value. He might say, in one word, that the Royal Irish Academy stood to Ireland in the same position as the Royal Society and the Antiquarian Society do to England. He (Mr. Gregory) had mentioned a few moments previously that the catalogue of antiquities had been prepared gratuitously by Sir William Wilde. The members had manifested on every occasion the same public spirit and liberality. As a general rule, the members of the Society were not wealthy men; but within no long period of time appeals had been made to their generosity, and they had nobly answered those appeals. By private subscription they raised funds to the amount of £1,067 to purchase Dean Dawson's collection of antiquities; for the Tara torques they gave £190; for Sir William Betham's Irish MSS., £600; for Hodges and Smith's Irish MSS., £723. They did not, therefore, come to ask for Government assistance from any unwillingness to spend their own money; but the burden of these constant calls had weighed heavily on the Society. Persons of small means, but most eligible, had abstained from becoming members owing to their inability to respond to them. Lastly, what was no small recommendation to any Irish body, might be added, that it had ever been untainted by the suspicion of having been actuated in its selections or proceedings by political or sectarian motives. Though this might seem a strange compliment to pay a learned body, yet it is no small one, considering that philosophers, though dwelling in the templa serena of science, were but men, and how busily, until recently, our countrymen had mingled with their severer studies the pleasurable excitement of hating each other for the love of God. He had now briefly described the origin and scope of the Royal Irish Academy, and that such account was correct could not be doubted, for he had almost quoted the very words of the Report of the Committee on Scientific Institutions, Dublin, 1864. Now for its present condition. He regretted beyond measure to say that the evidence taken before the Committee proved that its condition, both as regarded exhibition and the carrying out of its other objects, was very lamentable, and all for want of a small assistance. First of all, take its most popular department—namely, the museum. That, he regretted to say, was unavailable for the public. It was the strong wish of the Academy that this most remarkable museum and the valuable special library should be made of general use; but from want of space, although there was enough space in the building, and from unavoidable badness of arrangement, the specimens were scattered through the house. Some of these specimens were of extraordinary value, and it was necessary that they should, when exhibited, be exposed to no risk; but to effect this a responsible curator and an attendant were absolutely necessary before the public could be admitted. To put the house in thorough order a small expenditure by the Board of Works was necessary, and £200 per annum was unanimously voted by the Committee of 1864, to enable the Society to appoint a curator and carry out other objects connected with the museum. This small addition would enable the Society to give the world the full benefit of its unrivalled collection of Celtic antiquities. Then for the library; that, too, was unavailable. It could only be reached by going through the museum. It required a clerk to attend to it for the safety of the books and MSS. Here, again, the Committee unanimously recommended £200 additional per annum for the salary of a clerk, and for purchase of books and binding. Considering the special character of this library, and the necessity of adding to it from time to time books illustrative of all scientific, historical, and archæological matters connected with Ireland, this £200 was but a miserable dole. He (Mr. Gregory) really blushed at the niggardliness of his own report. He presumed that it was owing to having the Secretary for Ireland on one side of him, and a Lord of the Treasury on the other, that his recommendation was so parsimonious. For this library was of wonderful interest to Irishmen. It had recently received, by bequest of Mr. Halliday, a complete and extensive collection of pamphlets upon Irish subjects from a considerable back period up to the present time. But the glory of the Academy were its early Irish MSS., some of which were so full of historic interest that the House would pardon a brief description of them. There is a copy of the Gospels, said to be of the time of St. Patrick. There is a copy of the Psalms, said to have been executed by St. Columba, and to which a curious story was attached. St. Columba was a very aggressive saint in many particulars, but especially so in one. He invariably copied any book he found in the possession of any one else, which in those days was considered a violation of the rights of property. He paid a visit to St. Finnian, and in the dead of the night was accustomed to get up, go into his chapel, and there, by the help of a miraculous light which emanated from the tops of his fingers, he copied the saint's Book of Psalms. People in Ireland were quite as inquisitive in the 7th century as now. Some Irish gentleman, returning home late after dinner, saw the light in the chapel, and told St. Finnian. He claimed the copy. St. Columba refused to give it up. Diarmid, King of Ireland, sitting on his throne at Tara, was appealed to. His verdict was this—"Let the calf go with the cow"—that is, the copy with the original. In consequence of that decision, St. Columba, with a wail, shook the dust from off his feet, and left Ireland for Scotland. Some say this is the surreptitious copy. He was aware there was doubt about this manuscript being the true one, but Count Montalembert believed it, and he (Mr. Gregory) was content. Then there was the Book of Ballymote, of very early date, which was sold, in the year 1512, for 150 milch cows. Another MS. was of such value that it was given in ransom for the chief of the O'Dogherties and the son of O'Donel's chief poet; and it was in order to recover this MS. that O'Donel laid siege to Sligo in 1470. There were other MSS. also of great antiquity and interest. The Society was most desirous to print and circulate copies, which they were urgently requested to do by foreign societies, and which, had they belonged to foreign societies, would have been done long since. There was no chance of this being done, owing to the penury of the Society. It was true £200 had been granted for an Irish scribe, but the whole of that sum had been expended in transcribing, translating, and cataloguing. Again, for scientific researches £200 per annum had been recommended, and also £200 for illustrating the transactions and proceedings. The whole amount recommended by the Parliamentary Committee was £1,000 per annum, in addition to the present grant of £500. This recommendation was unanimously supported by the Members of the Government on the Committee, and by English and Irish Members alike. Beside that, however, evidence was taken by the Committee showing the necessity of special grants occasionally when objects peculiarly connected with Irish history should come into the market. The Secretary of the Treasury need not shake in his shoes. That, of course, could rarely be the case, and he was not likely to be subjected to many importunities. At this moment, however, there was to be sold a collection of the deepest interest to Ireland. It was the collection of the late Dr. Petrie. The sum demanded was comparatively small, but the value to Ireland was very great. He had heard rumours that Kensington was about to put forth its rapacious claws and take that collection into the bosom of science and art. He protested emphatically against such a proceeding. It was a collection essentially Irish, illustrating Irish history, identified with Irish localities. He did not believe there could be inflicted a greater affront on Ireland, and one that would be more resented, than to bring that collection, aye, or any portion or particle of it, to Kensington. On the other hand, it would be a compliment to Ireland to purchase and present it to the Royal Irish Academy. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was, he regretted, not present; but the Secretary of the Treasury would remember the universal acclaim with which the purchase of the Blacas collection was hailed by the country. He never knew an Irish Member yet who objected to any special grant for the acquisition of treasures of art and science for the honour and glory, and benefit of England, and he hoped in their case similar liberality would be shown to Ireland in a matter where she had such overwhelming claims as the acquisition of Dr. Petrie's collection. But besides an archæological collection of great value, Dr. Petrie left behind him two daughters. He would not ask the Government to acquire them for the nation, yet he did ask that it should be borne in mind that these ladies were in want, and that they represented a man who was an honour to Ireland, and whose investigations were held in respect on the Continent, wherever archæology is cultivated. He (Mr. Gregory) was astonished at the result of the application to the Treasury. The increased grant was the recommendation of a Select Committee perfectly unanimous. It had since been urged on the Treasury by the Lord Lieutenant in the warmest manner. . He believed, moreover, that it was the full intention of the late Government to have acted with liberality towards this Institution. He presumed it had been withheld on the ground of its being a private body ; but private societies were encouraged in this rich country; and he could safely say that if the Society were enabled to throw open its doors, it would be far more of a public body than any society subsidized in England. In his opinion it had peculiar claims. It was the one essentially Irish Institution. It investigated and kept up research in one of the languages of one of the great families of mankind—a language which would probably in another half century be extinct. Dr. Johnson says—

Mr. Gregory

“I have long wished that the Irish literature were cultivated. Ireland is known by tradition to have been once the seat of piety and of learning, and surely it would be very acceptable to all those who are curious either in the origin of nations and the affinities of languages to be fully informed of the revolution of a people so ancient, and once so illustrious.”

This was the very work the Academy was doing, and wished to extend. It was bringing to light the customs and laws of an ancient and peculiar race. As Mr. Hepworth Dixon's book on New America revealed the rise of new ideas on morality, and religion, and law, totally different from those amid which we live, so these old MSS. revealed old ideas on morality and law totally differing from those which obtain at present, but the traces of which may be still observed among the Irish peasantry. Surely an Institution so thoroughly identified with a country and with all its sympathies, and which was doing its work right well, was deserving of encouragement, and he felt convinced that the Chancellor of the Exchequer would agree with him. He (Mr. Gregory) would finish his observations with the concluding words of the Report of 1864—

“We should bear in mind that Dublin is not a provincial town, but the capital of a country ; that these learned associations do not merely tend to interest and keep together in the capital of Ireland a number of persons of high intelligence and attainments, but that the prudence and influence of such persons must influence and elevate society. State assistance, judiciously applied to Institutions such as these, though its results cannot be proved by figures, makes itself felt throughout the country, and encourages the formation of tastes, studies, and researches, and an activity of intellectual labour the value of which it is impossible to over-estimate.”

MR. HUNT said, he regretted that the hon. Gentleman had not postponed the question, his noble Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland not being in his place, and the Vice Presidency of the Privy Council being at present vacant. He could assure the hon. Gentleman that the Government were not indifferent to the promotion of science and art in Ireland, and that they sincerely sympathized with his desire that the Royal Irish Academy should flourish. A large sum of money would be proposed in the Estimates for the present year, for the purpose of improving and extending the usefulness of the Museum of Irish Industry, a grant which was recommended by the Committee of 1864, and he thought the hon. Gentleman could hardly blame the Government for not proposing to do more for the Academy during the present year. What had been the intentions of the late Government he could not say ; but neither in 1865 nor in 1866 did the grants exceed £200. Certainly, during the two years that had elapsed since the Commission reported, the late Government had not done all the Commissioners wished. The applications for assistance from Institutions of this kind were so numerous that it was impossible to entertain them all ; but the Government would promise to consider the circumstances which the hon. Gentleman had mentioned. With regard to Dr. Petrie's collection, he was not aware that it had been offered to the Government, but whenever such an offer was made, it would receive due consideration. With respect to the daughters of Dr. Petrie, there were at present a large number of similar applications ; but at a particular period of the year the First Lord of the Treasury dispensed a certain number of pensions, and this case would be taken into consideration by him at the proper time.

MR. O'REILLY said, he hoped that some additional support would be given to the Royal Irish Academy, which was the only Institution in Ireland for collecting and publishing materials for Irish history. The materials for English history had been published, and were to be found in the great Libraries; but many standard works of Irish history were yet in MS., and many of the printed works were of singular rarity; so that students of Irish history laboured under peculiar difficulties.

THE STRAITS SETTLEMENT.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. O'REILLY said, he rose to call attention to the position of the present Officers of the Straits Settlement, and to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can state which of these Officers will be retained and which superseded; and, with regard to the latter, what measures are proposed to prevent the transfer of the Settlement from the Indian to the Colonial Government, injuriously affecting their position and future career? The great Settlement at Singapore was last year transferred from the Indian to the Colonial Government. At the time of the transfer the officials were servants of the Indian Government. Many of them had served long and faithfully and looked forward to the service for a career during their lives, and at the completion of their term of service to a pension and promotion. They might be sent back to the Indian service or transferred to the colonial service. They nominally belonged to different branches of the Indian Government; but many of them had been for twenty years attached to the Straits Settlements, and had become familiar with the Malay and other languages spoken there. If they went back to the Indian service they would have no chance of promotion from the Indian Government, to which they nominally belonged. If they were transferred to the Colonial Government they would lose their right to Indian pensions. He believed it was in the contemplation of the late Government that the junior officers should go back to the Indian service, and that the senior officers should retain their Indian pensions and continue in the employment of the Colonial Government. He desired to know the decision of the present Colonial Office on this point. He would take the case of the Governor first—a general in the Indian army, who had served for better than thirty years with distinction in war and peace, and who had administered the Government of the Straits Settlements for six years to the satisfaction of those who served under him, and of the inhabitants of the Straits. Viscount Halifax, when leaving the Indian Office, expressed his high opinion of the zeal and energy with which the Governor of the Straits Settlements had carried on the public service. Probably he might have wished to retire, and it was natural to expect that in giving up his command his convenience might be considered. The authorities at the Colonial Office had been in communication with the Governor, but he never received from them the slightest intimation as to any change in his position. He did not know that it was intended to supersede him and appoint another Governor until he saw the appointment of his successor in the newspaper. The next officer to whom the change must bring considerable loss was the Colonial Secretary, who being nominally a lieutenant-colonel of Madras artillery would have nothing but the half-pay of that rank to fall back upon, and who, too, had no knowledge that he was to be superseded until he saw the appointment of his successor in a newspaper. He thought that these officers might have received a little more courtesy at the hands of the Colonial Office. He wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he could state which of these Officers would be retained, and which superseded; and, with regard to the latter, what measures were proposed to prevent the transfer of the Settlement from the Indian to the Colonial Government, injuriously affecting their position and future career?

Mr. O'Reilly

MR. ADDERLEY said, he understood from the hon. Gentleman that he did not impugn the proceeding of Parliament in making the change in question. When the Government came into office they had little more to do than pass the Bill through Parliament and take the necessary steps under it. It was considered absolutely necessary that the principal colonial offices should not be left in the hands of the Indian officers. It was thought that on account of the different systems of the Department it was necessary to substitute colonial for Indian officers. He might say if there had been any want of courtesy in doing this he was not aware of it, nor could the Colonial Office be, because the communication to the out-going Indian officer must have been made from the Indian Department. If it had not communicated the change in time he was not aware of the fact, and if it had so occurred it was much to be deplored, and he regretted it very much. Not a moment was lost after the Act was passed in carrying out the arrangements that were considered essential to it. The Colonial Office and the Indian Department conferred together, and it was decided at once that all uncovenanted officers should remain in their place, inasmuch as they were looked on as permanently attached to the Settlement, and they were retained on their full pay and pension. As to the covenanted or commissioned officers, they were of a class always changing, and in this case that required to be changed for the purpose of carrying out the new departmental system, with the exception of Captain M'Mahon, who was retained as the engineer and superintendent of works. The services of some of these officers were temporarily retained; but as a general rule the covenanted officers would be sent back to the Indian Government to re-occupy the position from which they had been only temporarily removed. It was distinctly understood when they took their offices that the appointment was only a temporary dissociation from services under the Indian Government, the usual time in each case had expired, and where the offices they had so held were more lucrative than those they left and were to return to, they had had all the expected benefit. The hon. Gentleman asked him what measures had been taken to secure these officers from being injured by the transfer. He presumed the hon. Gentleman referred to the ultimate expectations of these officers as to pensions. The Earl of Carnarvon had communicated to the Indian Government that it had been arranged to apply to them the same system as was applied to the Hong Kong and Ceylon services, and officers who retired from age, fifty-five being the period at which they would do so, they would be entitled to one-twelfth of their salaries for pension. The officers would be liberally dealt with in regard to these pensions, their services in each place would count, and he understood, though as Under Secretary he personally knew nothing of such appointments, that all that could be done had been done.

MR. O'REILLY: Was it not the duty of the Colonial Office to communicate to the officers that they were superseded?

MR. ADDERLEY: It is the duty of every Department to communicate with its own officers. The Colonial Office does not communicate with the officers of the Indian Department.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, he knew nothing of these particular cases, but he did know something of the Straits Settlements. He hoped that the general proceedings of the Colonial Office were not such as they appeared to have been in this instance. The reason why Parliament desired to transfer the Straits Settlements from the India to the Colonial Office was, he apprehended, because those settlements were totally different from India, in a totally different state of society, and had always been under a totally different system of government. There was no natural connection between the Straits Settlements and India; but as soon as the transfer was made it was thought necessary by the Colonial Office that the officers, who had been conducting the affairs of the Settlements, as seemed to be implied, upon the Indian system, should be superseded by others who would conduct them upon the colonial system. He wanted to know what the colonial system was. He hoped and trusted that there was no such thing. How could there be one system for the government of Demerara, Mauritius, the Cape of Good Hope, Ceylon, and Canada? What was the special fitness of a gentleman who had been employed in the administration of the affairs of one of those colonies, for the government of another of which he knew nothing, and in regard to which his experience in other places could supply him with no knowledge? What qualifications had such a man, that should render it necessary to appoint him to transact business of which he knew nothing, in the place of gentlemen who did understand it, and who had been carrying it on, not certainly upon the Indian system, and he believed upon no system whatever but the Straits Settlements system? He did not know upon what principle the government of the Straits Settlements was to be carried on by the Colonial Office; but he did know that the principle upon which such trusts were administered by the old East India Company was that of retaining a man in the position the duties of which he understood, and they would never have thought of removing a man from an office of which he understood all the details, and replacing him by one who knew nothing about them. He knew nothing of the gentlemen who had administered the government of the Straits Settlements. He was not even aware whether they desired to retain their offices: but he was sure that if they did, it would have been for the public advantage that they should be allowed to keep them. At all events, if they were to be removed, they ought to have been informed of that intention by some Department of the Government, and ought not to have been allowed to learn it from reading in a newspaper that their successors had been appointed. That that should have occurred was very discreditable to somebody; and for his own part he should have thought that it was the duty of the Colonial Office to communicate with these gentlemen, because they were still serving in a territory which had been transferred to that Department, and were not then acting under the India Office. They must, indeed, until they ceased to exercise their functions, have been in communication with the Colonial Office upon a hundred other subjects, and it was curious that the only topic upon which the Colonial Department did not think it necessary to intimate its sentiments to them, was that of their removal from their posts, and the appointment of their successors.

MR. ADDERLEY said, that when he spoke of a change of system, he did not refer to a change in the system of government in the locality, but as to a change in the system of communication with the office at home as between the India Office and the Colonial Office.

MR. OLIPHANT said, he did not comprehend whether the right hon. Gentleman meant that the system on which the Straits Settlement was administered was to be totally changed.

MR. ADDERLEY said, it was merely the system of communication with the Departments that was changed.

MR. OLIPHANT said, that with regard to the change of system, he did not see why the transfer from one Department to another should render it impossible to provide properly for old servants. It had given very great dissatisfaction that gentlemen who had been in the Settlements for a very long while should be changed for entire strangers who knew nothing of the language of the country, and who were not so well accustomed, and who, therefore, were not so well able to perform the duties. It was very hard, too, that gentlemen who had fulfilled their duties satisfactorily for many years should be withdrawn without having proper provision made for them. It was said that those who returned to India would join their regiments, but the House could readily imagine that after perhaps twenty years' absence, the duties of, say a lieutenant-colonel, would have to be learned over again. He hoped the Government would take the case of these gentlemen into their consideration.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," withdrawn.

Committee deferred till Monday next.

METROPOLITAN POOR (re-committed) BILL.

(Mr. Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Earle.)

[BILL 66.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clauses 1 to 4, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 5 (Asylums to be provided).

MR. J. STUART MILL said, he was too much alive to the extreme difficulty of carrying any measure for the improvement of the law or its administration to be over critical in regard to the present Bill, as it was brought forward with a real desire to improve the administration of the Poor Law, and really did so in many important particulars. But he wished to make a few observations, chiefly for the purpose of eliciting the views of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy), and of entering a caveat in respect to principles of administration which seemed to him true and just, but which that measure was very far from carrying out to the extent which he was persuaded the House and the country would come in time to think desirable. He wished to ask the reason why the Bill, in the new system which it originated, preserved so much of the fractional character of the old system. Why was it necessary, for example, that there should be one set of managers for asylums, and a different set for dispensaries? Why were asylums to be provided according to districts marked out by the Poor Law Board, while dispensaries were to be provided according to parishes and unions? Both of those institutions, being kindred institutions, must be managed in a certain degree on the same principles, and those who were capable of managing the one must be capable of managing the other. Why was it thought necessary that the management of every separate asylum should be under a separate body, and that every separate dispensary should be under a separate management?

Mr. J. Stuart Mill

No doubt, the right hon. Gentleman meant that there should be the same system of administration for them, and trusted to the powers reserved for the Poor Law Board for establishing it. But it was a sound rule that the administration of the same kind of things ought to be, as far as possible, on a large scale, and under the same management. A Central Board would be under the eye of the public, who would know and think more about it than about local Boards. It would act under a much greater sense of responsibility. The number of persons capable of adequately performing the duties in question was necessarily limited, and such persons would be more easily induced to undertake duties on a large scale than on a small one. It was probable that a considerable number of powers now reserved to the Poor Law Board might safely be exercised by such a Central Board; which would, to that extent, preserve the principle of the administration of the local affairs of the people by their own representatives. He was not one of those who desired to weaken the power of the Poor Law Board to guide local authorities, and supersede them when they failed in their duty, for Poor Law administration is not a local but a national concern. But there was much force in what was said by some local authorities, who did not object to the main principles of this Bill, who admitted that its proposals were necessary, who applauded the right hon. Gentleman for making them, yet had fair ground for urging that they ought to have the opportunity of themselves doing what was required, and that interference should take place only when they had failed. With a view to future legislation it would be well worth considering whether the administration of the relief of the sick poor for the whole of London should not be placed under central instead of local management, the Central Board to be constituted by election, or partly by election and partly by nomination. He did not wonder that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) had not chosen to leave the sick poor in the hands of the vestries. Vestry government was hole and corner government, and he hoped the time was coming when they would not tolerate hole and corner administration for any purpose whatever. He hoped, before long, to have the opportunity of bringing this matter before the House in connection with the general subject of metropolitan local government. Of course, some of the vestries had suffered wrongfully for the deficiencies of those who had done worse; but it was in the essence of hole and corner government to be comparatively irresponsible, inefficient, jobbing, and carried on by inferior persons—objections which would not apply to a Central Board. With a Central Board in existence, the duties of the vestries would be those of superintendence rather than of execution. A numerically large Board was unfit for executive or administrative duties, but admirably fitted for looking after those who were intrusted with such duties. Administrative duties were best intrusted to a single hand, which should be responsible, and, if possible, paid; and the executive administration of the Poor Laws should principally devolve on paid officers, who would be watched in the districts by the vestries, which would consist of ready-made critics superintending others with a vigilance with which they did not like others to superintend them. The proposal to make the asylums medical schools, and thus to secure to them a high degree of publicity and the constant supervision of skilled persons, did the greatest credit to whoever suggested it, and was a proof of a real capacity for practical legislation.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was glad the hon. Member for Westminster had taken this opportunity of expressing his opinions on the Bill, and of stating what he thought might have been made of it; but he was sure the hon. Member would recognise the great difficulties there were in making an entire change in an already existing system. An experiment would be made by the Bill which, to a certain extent, would effect the object the hon. Member had in view. He had already stated that any one devising a new system would wisely place lunatic, fever, and small pox hospitals under one Board; and the hon. Member would observe that it was not proposed to have a Board of management for each separate asylum, but one for each district; so that, if the metropolis were made one district, a Central Board would be created. If that experiment were tried, it would be seen whether the powers of the Board might, with benefit, be applied to other purposes. In this view, possibly, much of the hon. Member's objection might be removed, because the change was one which might be developed into something like the system he had sketched. Dispensaries would remain in the hands of Boards of Guardians, who had not been objected to as administrators of outdoor relief. The dispensaries would differ from the hospitals in being restricted to the relief of outdoor poor; and for that reason he thought it prudent to leave them, as they were in Ireland, under the care of dispensary committees of the Board of Guardians. It would be observed that he had provided for district Boards dividing themselves into committees for departmental administration, and by such division the evils of administration by a large Board would be obviated. A Central Board might, perhaps, be intrusted with still greater powers, such as contracting for the supply of drugs for the whole metropolis. He had kept these things in view; but he thought it wise to proceed by steps, and if we once got a Central Board, the House would consider how far the principle might be beneficially extended. He was glad the hon. Member for Westminster approved making the asylums medical schools; a plan which had been formerly adopted in connection with the Marylebone Workhouse, and had contributed to the education of some of the most eminent medical men of the day. At Galway the medical students of the Queen's College were admitted to the workhouse infirmary, with great benefit to themselves, while their admission constituted a good system of inspection. He was glad to have the assistance of the hon. Member for Westminster in carrying the Bill.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, that so far as he could understand the right hon. Gentleman, he concurred with the hon. Member for Westminster in thinking that there ought to be, sooner or later, a single Board which should control all those asylums for the sick poor, and that there should be uniformity of management. He was glad to hear it, as that was his own opinion; but he could not see that any provision, calculated to have that effect, was contained in the Bill. He wished to know from the right hon. Gentleman whether he had any particular object in calling the places in question "asylums." He thought the appellation was an unfortunate one, inasmuch as there were peculiar associations connected with asylums, not corresponding with the purposes of these buildings, and it might give offence to that class of persons for whom asylums were set apart, who were not paupers. He would, therefore, suggest the substitution of the word "hospital," or the words "places where the sick poor shall be relieved."

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he was of opinion that it would be better the word "hospital" should be employed. To the Bill itself he entertained the objection that it contained no provision tending to procure the speedy and permanent restoration to health of the sick poor. Its tendency was to benefit the vicious rather than the virtuous sick poor. There was also nothing to prevent the guardians from appointing unfit instead of well-trained nurses.

MR. AYRTON said, he did not concur in the extremely sensitive criticism of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. P. Villiers). The right hon. Gentleman's only objection to the clause appeared to be the use of the word "asylum," and if that were so, was it really a serious matter for discussion? They would never get through the Bill if such dissertations as these were encouraged. These establishments were to be provided for the reception of the sick chargeable poor, and as it was not an establishment for benevolent purposes, but associated with poor relief, one word was as good as another.

SIR MATTHEW RIDLEY said, there was no real force in the objection of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton. They had pauper lunatic asylums established all over the country, but no objection was taken to the word "asylum." There was greater stigma attached to the word "workhouse."

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he thought there was a good deal in the name of a building. The word "asylum" was a most unfortunate one to apply to a building which was to be used for the poor. There were various kinds of asylums, but in such establishments it was a rule not to admit any one who had received parish relief. In using the word "asylum," therefore, they lessened the distinction which ought to exist between those who received relief from the parish and those who received relief from benevolent and charitable institutions. Taking this name for the new institutions would seriously injure existing asylums. There were asylums for the blind, the deaf and dumb, for indigent gentlemen and decayed merchants. If the word were applied to receptacles for paupers, it might bring discredit on the others. It was most important to maintain the line of demarcation between those who had been in the habit of receiving parish relief, and those who had gone through life and supported their families without parish relief, but did not object to enter asylums supported by the subscriptions of the benevolent.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, it was not of much consequence what word was used as long as proper relief was given to the sick, insane, and infirm. The relief ought to be confined to them exclusively, and he should move to omit from the clause the words "or other class or classes," under which even able-bodied paupers might be admitted into these asylums.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would state clearly what classes it was intended to provide for under the clause. He wished to defend the metropolitan guardians. There were 35,000 persons receiving relief in London workhouses, and only four cases of bad usage had been established. He did not care what they called the new buildings. "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet," but if this was to be a national scheme, the cost should not be levied on the metropolitan unions, but on the Consolidated Fund.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he must express his regret that so much discussion had been provoked by this clause, which, he had thought, did not contain anything likely to lead to misapprehension. In bringing forward the Bill he had stated in the most distinct manner that its object was to give to the Poor Law Board power to classify the different kinds of paupers in the metropolis. It was an essential part of the scheme that the classification should be undertaken under the direction of the Poor Law Board. He never intended to mix up the sick with other paupers, nor was there any indication of such an intention in the Bill. On the contrary, his object was to separate them. It might be advantageous in some cases to have a building for one class, even, perhaps, the able-bodied, in a particular district. The object of the clause was to give the Poor Law Board the necessary powers to classify the whole order of paupers, lying-in women, able-bodied and so on, and to that end it was essential that the words proposed to be omitted should be retained in the clause. It would be hardly necessary for him to say anything about the word "asylum." The word "hospital" would be open to the same objection. In the writings of the persons who urged this measure upon the House the question was asked why these places were called workhouses any longer when they were, in fact, places for the sick, insane, and infirm.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS said, he thought that no satisfactory explanation had been given about the words proposed to be omitted. If they were allowed to remain the Poor Law Board would have the power of taking any class of paupers out of the workhouses and sending them to special establishments, and the guardians would then be defunct.

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped that the manner in which his hon. and learned Friend had responded to the appeal that he would address himself to the subject of the clause would be generally followed in the House. He thought the best feature of the Bill was the prospect it offered of a classification of metropolitan paupers. If the poor were classified, the result would be not only economy, but efficiency and greater humanity. He trusted the Amendment would not be pressed.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he did not want to oppose the classification of paupers. On the contrary, he fully acknowledged the advantages that would result from such a procedure. He wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman intended to have a separate building for every class of the poor distinct from the other?

MR. GILPIN said, he had come to the conclusion that the Bill perfectly and simply carried out what it professed in its title, and also what the right hon. Gentleman declared to be its object. He hoped, therefore, that the hon. Member for Marylebone (Mr. Harvey Lewis) would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 6 (Formation of Districts.)

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS said, he should like to know whether there was power given to the Board to constitute one large parish into a district? If there were not such powers given he should like to introduce words to effect that object.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that there were such powers given to do it or not; and therefore if nothing were done, the parish or union would remain as it was.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 (Number of Asylums.)

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS said, that some districts, especially the East of London, would be unable to find funds to erect those asylums, and suggested that they should be enabled to avail themselves of the existing charitable institutions of the metropolis, such as the small pox and fever hospitals, which had a much better medical staff than the local authorities could command.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, it was notorious that the different districts availed themselves of the Lock Hospital and other institutions, and there was no reason why the same system should not continue. But, as a general rule, those hospitals to which the hon. and learned Member referred were intended for a different class of persons altogether than those who were likely to enter the asylums to be constituted under the Bill.

SIR MATTHEW RIDLEY said, he thought it highly proper that those asylums should be established in the various districts of the metropolis.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 agreed to.

Clause 9 (Constitution of Managers.)

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS said, he should move, as an Amendment, the insertion of the words, "The Managers shall be elected," and the omission of the words, "Partly elected and partly nominated." He desired that the experiment about to be tried should be tried in a modified form, and that there should be no nominated managers; but if it were found that the system he proposed did not work well, it could be altered, and nominees might be appointed. He had been told by all who were competent to form an opinion on the question, that the system of nominating the managers was one that would not work well. The nominated guardians would either attend the Board, and have it all their own way, or would not attend it at all, except when something special was to be done, and thus a bad feeling would arise.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 5, after the word "shall," to insert the words "be elected."—(Mr. Thomas Chambers.)

MR. McCULLAGH TORRENS said, he was one of those who were sincerely anxious that this Bill should pass. He gave the right hon. Gentleman the greatest credit for the measure, but this clause was, in his mind, fatal to the whole Bill. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider whether he would make the principle involved in the clause a sine qua non. He had heard no one out of that House give any opinion but one—namely, that this was the first step towards taking away the control of the ratepayers in Poor Law expenditure and management. The House ought to weigh well the magnitude of this question. He would raise no other difficulty, because he wished the Bill to pass; and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman to let the clause remain open until the other portions of the Bill were disposed of.

Mr. Thomas Chambers

MR. J. STUART MILL said, he agreed with the hon. Gentleman, and did not see any reason for the provisions in the Bill by which the Poor Law Board were empowered to appoint a certain number of guardians. According to his view, the guardians were, or ought to be, quite competent to perform their duties without any assistance from the Government of any kind; but in the case of the appointment of a manager, in whom special skill was required, popular election might not be altogether so satisfactory as the appointment of a responsible functionary. He was therefore fully disposed to support this particular clause, although he should oppose, with his hon. Friend the Member for Finsbury, that part of the Bill which left the nomination of the guardians in the hands of the Poor Law Board.

MR. DOULTON said, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would consider the objection which had been made to the clause as it stood.

MR. AYRTON said, he trusted the objection would not be pressed. It would be extremely inconvenient to ask the Committee to divide on an abstract question. Under the present system of Poor Law administration the nominative principle was adopted, as was instanced in the fact that in country unions justices of the peace were ex officio members of the Boards of Guardians. It was very desirable to have some responsible person connected with the administration of the Poor Law.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he took for granted that the object of this legislation was to provide a better system of relieving the sick poor in the workhouse. The past system had failed chiefly on account of certain views taken by the guardians as to the requirements of the medical officers and the medical relief; and also from their not observing the rules and regulations of the Central Board. These regulations were apparently perfect for their purpose; but so far had they been neglected it was perfectly impossible to know whether they were observed or not unless they had somebody on the spot, who could observe what took place in the establishment, and would communicate the result to the Board. This required some close relations between the Board of Guardians and the Central Board. He certainly should have suggested that there should be some person in these Boards generally more immediately under the control of the Central Board, than those contemplated under the system of nomination—some person connected with the Central Board, almost in the pay of the Board, and who had an interest in discharging the duty of seeing that the rules and regulations of the Board were carefully carried out. Without such person there might be a recurrence of the abuses recently disclosed. He presumed the right hon. Gentleman had found some difficulty in having such a connection between the Central Board and the Boards of Management, and he had substituted for it a provision that there should be some person nominated. He hoped, if this Bill passed, that the right hon. Gentleman, or whoever might be his successor in office, would be able to make provision as to the fitness of the persons to preside over the medical establishments. The number of managers ought to be limited, and that would limit the number of nominees. The fewer these Boards were composed of the better, and the stronger would be the administration. He should think three would be enough, and then there would be one Government nominee. The only doubt he felt was as to the persons supposed to be willing to accept the office of nominated members. He objected to a man's qualification for the office of guardian being measured by the rateable value of the tenement he occupied. Also, he could not conceive any persons giving up their whole time to the duties of an office unless they were paid for it. At the same time, the measure was tentative, and in the right direction; for those reasons it was entitled to favour, and, if in practice it should prove defective, the right hon. Gentleman or any of his successors would doubtless be willing to amend it.

MR. BUTLER said, that as the representative of eighteen parishes in the eastern part of the metropolis, he could say that the feeling of the guardians was strongly opposed to the novel principle embodied in the Bill. He was sure the clause would not work well.

MR. OLIPHANT said, he wished to ask whether there was any possibility of strengthening the inspectorate? Nobody in this world would do anything for nothing. Gentlemen opposite who were governing the country were paid for it—the members of the actual Executive he meant. Men might be excellent guardians; but unless they were guardian-angels they would not give up so much time, which was giving up so much money, without any equivalent whatever. The fact that men did not get an equivalent in hard cash only proved that they must get an equivalent in some other form.

COLONEL HOGG said, he admitted that in some respects the guardians had not done their duty, but no guardians had ever received any remuneration of any sort for the work they did. If the hon. Gentleman had inquired into the affairs of the metropolitan workhouses he would have found that all the guardians, whether rich or poor, had given their time gratuitously. The manner in which they had discharged their duties was a credit to them.

MR. OLIPHANT said, he did not mean to cast any aspersions on the guardians. He had simply contended that the proper principle to act upon was to pay these men, and then their work would be efficiently done. As long as guardians were not paid for their work they might be expected to attend to their work as it suited their convenience, just as Members of the House of Commons attended the House, not every day and night, but as it suited them. In the case of hospitals and asylums great care was required, and the way to secure a proper superintendence of them was to pay for the superintendence.

MR. CANDLISH said, the President of the Poor Law Board could make this clause work as he pleased. The House admitted that the principle of the Bill was excellent, but this clause would introduce an entire novelty in legislation. The House, on account of the general excellence of the Bill, was prepared to meet its blemishes leniently. But he asked the right hon. Gentleman to discard from it this new principle of nomination.

MR. NEATE said, he thought it was much better to have paid representatives from the Poor Law Board on the Boards of Management. The managers would have to dispose not only of the parish funds, but of the common funds. A certain portion of the managers should be taken from the nominated guardians, and he would support the clause as it stood.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, there was a great deal of difference between allowing justices of the peace to act as ex officio guardians and permitting the Poor Law Board to nominate one-third of those managers. It was assumed that the metropolitan Boards of Guardians had neglected their duty, but he denied that that was the case. Some Boards of Guardians of the metropolis might have acted improperly, but the majority of the Boards of Guardians of the metropolis had devoted a large portion of their time to the discharge of their duties. His hon. Friend on his left (Mr. Oliphant) had a small acquaintance with the management of those matters; otherwise he would know that the persons elected Poor Law Guardians received no pecuniary reward, and were quite content with the thanks and kindly feeling of those around them when they had performed their duties. It was unfair to say that because there was mis-management in the parishes under the control of the Poor Law Board from the commencement, a general rule should be laid down by which the whole of the guardians of the metropolis should be deprived of their present power. The President of the Poor Law Board had admitted that when he visited the City of London Union he had been pleased with everything he saw. He warned the country Members that if the proposed innovation was adopted in London it would soon spread throughout the country. He hoped this new principle would not be introduced.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the number of Boards in London would be a serious argument against the proposal to appoint a paid officer to attend each of them. He repeated that the eyes and ears of the Poor Law Board were not sufficiently numerous, and to remedy this defect he hoped to meet with persons who would take their places at the several Boards in behalf of the Central Board, not from the love of money, but from the love of doing good. He had already received a letter from a medical man, who had filled some of the highest positions in India, and who had recently retired from practice, a friend of Sir John Lawrence, as he had been also of his brother, offering to place himself entirely at the disposal of the Board for the parish in which he resided. He agreed that the Boards should not be too large nor the nominees too numerous. The hon. Member for London (Mr. Alderman Lawrence), who had spoken with great emphasis on the question, forgot that the nomination system had not yet been tried, and he could assure country Members that if it failed in London it would not be proposed to extend it to the country.

Mr. Neale

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he thought it would be found that the nominees and the guardians would not agree. His constituents greatly disliked the provision.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS said, that the Poor Law Board should effect the object they contemplated by the employment of inspectors, and not by the employment of spies, for as such they would be treated. What set of gentlemen would like to conduct business with persons appointed to watch their proceedings with a view to report them to the head office?

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, it was not a novel proposal that the Central Board should know what was going on at the Boards of Guardians; that was stipulated in the general Act, but hitherto the Central Board had not possessed the machinery requisite for informing itself.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 10; Noes 115: Majority 105.

MR. VANDERBYL: I have carefully perused the Bill now under consideration; and while I fully concur in the favourable opinions expressed concerning it by different Members of this House as well as by the public generally, I cannot refrain from proposing two Amendments. And first with regard to the clause now under discussion—Clause 9. This clause states that the managers shall be elective and nominated; and the two following clauses describe the necessary qualifications, which it will be observed are of a purely monetary character, founded upon the rateable value assessed. Proceeding to Clause 22, we find some of the duties of these managers defined. They are to provide medical appliances and requisites for the treatment of the sick; and I may add they will have to attend to the construction and ventilation of wards, to decide often whether certain applicants are suitable for admission to those wards, and to consider a variety of subjects involving the health and comfort of the sick poor. Now it seems to me that some scientific qualification is essential; and considering the nature of the subjects that will constantly be coming before the managers, I know of no man better qualified to explain matters or give advice than the medical officer. His hospital training prepares him for this, and his daily intercourse with the sick poor in the asylum renders him better able than anybody else to describe at the meetings of managers what may be required—better far than any manager can. It is on these grounds that I propose as an Amendment that the medical officer for the time being shall be ex-officio a member of the Board. I am aware that many hon. Members think he can be called in when his opinion is wanted; but I think it is inconsistent with the dignity of the medical profession that the medical officer should be called in when required as if he were a nurse or a porter; and what is more important, I believe the sick poor will never be so well cared for while the medical officer (who so thoroughly understands their wants) is debarred from representing them on the Board. Supposing he has not a seat, what usually happens? Why, he has to describe what is required to some friendly manager, who will, of course, report what has been told him to the Board. Now we all know how much ordinary statements gain by repetition, and I also know how much scientific statements often lose thereby. By giving the medical officer the position to which his education and scientific knowledge even now so justly entitle him, I believe that men with still higher qualifications will apply for the appointments, especially as the Bill provides for the establishment of medical schools in connection with the district asylums. I have been asked by the noble Lord the Member for Chester to substitute his Amendment for mine, and as it is more comprehensive, I have no objection to do so. I therefore beg to move that—

“The medical officer for the time being of any workhouse infirmary, and the resident medical officer of any asylum under this Act, and the district medical officer attached to any dispensary under this Act, shall be a member, without power of voting, of the Board of Guardians, Board of Managers, or Dispensary Committee, respectively.”

EARL GROSVENOR said, he approved the Amendment, which would do away with the necessity of medical officers, who were educated men, being compelled to knock their heels about outside the Board-room while questions of interest to them, and in the discussion of which they were well qualified to take a part, were being considered within.

COLONEL HOGG said, that the ratepayers could now, if they thought it desirable, elect medical men as guardians, and often did so; and it would be adopting a new principle, and one which, in his opinion, would not work at all well if the Committee agreed to the Amendment. When questions were discussed in which the advice of the medical officer was advantageous that officer was generally requested to appear before the Board and give his opinion, and if that course were not adopted on such occasions the guardians would fail to perform their duty.

MR. AYRTON said, it was often desirable to have the medical officer's opinion in writing for the guidance of the Board; but if that officer became a member, even without the power of voting, he would not only be oftentimes placed in a false position, but his efficiency would frequently be destroyed. He was an officer to the Board; he ought not, therefore, to be a member of it.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, that guardians were not to be blamed that they wanted knowledge in law and medicine, and when sanitary questions arose it was advisable that decision should not be come to in the absence of the medical officer. If the medical officer was only present to give advice, it would be productive of good, it would lead to a great improvement in his position, and would tend to prevent a repetition of the disgraceful circumstances which had occurred under the existing system.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, that as the medical man was an executive officer, he ought not to sit upon a Board which might have to pass judgment upon his acts.

MR. BRADY said, the failure of the Poor Law had hitherto been because the medical men had not had power, and therefore, as this was a step in the right direction, he should support the addition of the words.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he could not conceive anything less useful than putting medical men upon a Board where they had no vote, and where it would virtually amount to a waste of their time, which might be more usefully employed elsewhere.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he strongly objected to the Amendment in the interest of medical men themselves, on the ground that it would place them in a most unpleasant position. They had now power to report anything they pleased to the Board of Guardians, or to the Poor Law Board.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 10 (Election of Managers.)

SIR T. F. BUXTON said, he moved the omission of certain words at the end of the clause, on the ground that if they were retained the guardians would be limited in their choice of managers for these asylums.

MR. AYRTON moved, after the word "ratepayers," to insert the words "qualified to be guardians."

Clause amended accordingly.

Sir T. F. Buxton's Amendment negatived.

Clause 11 agreed to.

Clauses 12 to 19, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 20 (Furniture, &c., for Asylum.)

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he strongly objected that, as provided by the clause, the guardians should be mere servants of the Poor Law Board even in the matter of providing furniture and fixtures. In this, as in everything else, everything must be done according to the order of the Poor Law Board.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that was exactly what this clause did not provide. It provided that the managers should provide the necessary fixtures, furniture, and conveniences, and if they did not do enough then, as the Poor Law Board might from time to time direct.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 21 to 28, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 29 (Use of Asylums as Medical Schools.)

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS said, objection had been taken to the provision for constituting the lunatic asylums medical schools. In cases in which that had been done it had been found a great nuisance.

SIR HARRY VERNEY moved that the words "and for the training of nurses" should be added to the clause.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 30 agreed to.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock, till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, March 11, 1867.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—
Clerical Vestments (39).

Committee—Alimony Arrears * (17).

Report—Alimony Arrears * (17).

CLERICAL VESTMENTS BILL.

PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY: My Lords, perhaps your Lordships will allow me to lay upon the table a Bill which has been prepared for the correction of certain ritualistic abuses which have crept into the Church of England. Your Lordships are perfectly aware how deeply the feelings of the people have been moved by the introduction into the service of the Church of innovations so little in accordance with the long-established system of public worship in our country, and more particularly by that which relates to sacrificial vestments. It is on that account that the Bill which I am about to introduce touches the question of sacrificial vestments alone; and for two reasons—first, because those vestments strike the eye and offend the sense of the country in a particular and unusual degree; and secondly, because there is some ambiguity in the law on the subject. With respect to other matters—candles, incense, and other matters of that description, I believe the law is not doubtful, and we can redress the abuses by prosecutions in the Courts of Law; but with respect to sacrificial vestments there is a doubt, and because there is that doubt I now venture to propose a Bill to your Lordships. My object is to give the force of law to a usage regulating ceremonials of public worship that has existed in this country for nearly 300 years down to the present time. That usage—if we may call it so—was first prescribed by a statute of the latter end of the reign of Edward VI. The Act was repealed in the time of Queen Mary; but the same usage was afterwards re-instituted by the injunctions of Queen Elizabeth, in the year 1564. These injunctions regulated the ceremonial of the Church until 1603, when Convocation embodied in a canon—the 58th of the canons of the Church of England—the usage that had existed in the time of Edward VI., and under the injunctions of Queen Elizabeth in 1564. That canon was formed by the Convocation of the two Provinces of Canterbury and York, and was ratified by the Crown. The canon runs in this form—

“Every minister saying the public prayers or ministering the sacraments or other rites of the Church shall wear a decent and comely surplice with sleeves; and if any question arise touching the matter, decency, or comeliness thereof, the same shall be decided by the discretion of the Ordinary. Furthermore, such ministers as are graduates shall wear upon their surplices, at such times, such hoods as by the orders of their Universities are agreeable to their degrees, which no minister shall wear, being no graduate, under pain of suspension. Notwithstanding, it shall be lawful for such ministers as are not graduates to wear upon their surplices, instead of hoods, some decent tippet of black, so it be not silk.”

I propose, my Lords, to give effect to this by means of the statute law without touching the rubric or the canons. I merely adopt the spirit of the canon which was agreed to by Convocation and ratified by the Crown in 1604, the year after. I submitted this Bill to the right rev. Bench, and many distinguished Prelates entirely concurred in its provisions. Since that time, however, I have heard that the most rev. Prelate the Archbishop of Canterbury intends to propose a Bill on the part of the Bishops to this House. I am glad that it is so; but nevertheless I must submit this Bill to your Lordships, because it is doubtful when the Bill of the most rev. Prelate may be propounded, whether it may not be delayed or defeated, and I am anxious that there should be some measure in readiness to meet the case of either of these emergencies. Moreover, I cannot but think it right that after much trouble and time have been devoted to the framing of this measure it should be submitted to the country with the view of obtaining its opinion upon it. I beg, my Lords, to move that this Bill be now read a first time.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: It is quite true that the right rev. Bench do feel the gravity of the matter; the subject has been under our serious consideration for some time past, and we have come to the conclusion to bring in a Bill. But I am bound to say we hesitated whether that was the best course to be taken. I earnestly hope that in a week or ten days we may come to some definite conclusion.

Motion agreed to.

A Bill for better enforcing Uniformity in the Clerical Vestments and Ornaments to be worn by Ministers of the United Church of England and Ireland in the Performance of Public Worship—Was presented by The Earl of SHAFESBURY; read 1^a. (No. 39.)

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE— REFORM STATISTICS.—QUESTION.

EARL GRANVILLE asked, Whether it was the intention of the Government to lay upon the table of the House any information with respect to Reform in addition to that which had been collected by the late Government?

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that no additional statistics with regard to the representation of the people had been called for by the Government or produced. All the statistical information which they had was already before Parliament; but that information would be shortly presented to Parliament in a more compact and comprehensive form, for the purpose of supplying the best information as to the probable effect of the Government proposals. He understood that several Motions for the purpose of obtaining further information had been made in the other House, and of course it was perfectly competent for any Member of their Lordships' House to make the same Motions here.

BRITISH MUSEUM— NATURAL HISTORY COLLECTION.

QUESTION.

In reply to a Question by Lord LYVEDEN, EARL STANHOPE said, there was no foundation whatever for the rumour that the Trustees of the British Museum had come to any new decision as to the separation of the Natural History collection from the other collections of the British Museum. The recommendation which they did make was made seven years ago, upon the Motion of Lord Palmerston, who was then an Official Trustee, and was to the effect that it would be desirable to separate from the British Museum the collection of Natural History. But to assert that there had been any altered decision of the Trustees in a contrary sense, or in any sense, was not well founded.

MR. FRANCE'S PAMPHLET.

RESOLUTION.

Report of the Select Committee on Mr. France's Pamphlet read.

LORD REDESDALE said, that according to the Notice he had given, he proposed to call their Lordships' attention to the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the subject of Mr. France's pamphlet. The Report of that Committee was that the charge made by Mr. France against the Chairman of Committees, of having improperly introduced a clause into the Mold and Denbigh Junction Railway Bill of 1865, was without foundation. This relieved him from any impression the pamphlet might have been calculated to produce: but he regretted in some respects the manner in which the subject was referred to the Committee, because they were prevented reporting in some way upon the character of the clause introduced, and upon the circumstances which led to its introduction. These were matters of some importance, and he wished, therefore, to refer to them. The Bill in question was originally opposed; but the opposition having been withdrawn the Bill came before him as an unopposed Bill, and he then inserted the usual clause to meet the circumstances of a junction Bill. Under the circumstances, it was perfectly reasonable and proper that the clause should be introduced, and he was entirely absolved from the charge of having introduced it improperly by the evidence of Mr. France's own solicitor. In answer to the question whether, supposing the matter had been opposed before a Committee, he could have resisted the clause, he admitted that he could not; and his own impression was that it was a clause which it would have been impossible to have resisted, and that was the reason he gave his sanction to its introduction. Their Lordships would perceive that as regarded the clause, as well as the manner of its introduction, no blame could attach to himself. This was the seventeenth year he had filled the office of Chairman of Committees. In the seventh year of his holding the office a similar attack was made upon him in the Edinburgh Review. Fortunately the charges made were specific, and the editor of that work having allowed him the privilege of an answer to those charges, in the next number he wrote a reply; and he believed those of their Lordships who had seen the publication would admit that in the most complete manner he refuted every one of the charges brought against him. Now ten years afterwards this charge was brought against him; and their Lordships would see from the temper in which it was made that if any other charge could have been made it would have been preferred. He was far from regretting that the charge had been made, because its isolation and the complete answer to it proved by inference that he had discharged the duties of his office creditably to himself and advantageously to the House. Mr. France made his charge in a pamphlet sent to nearly all the Members of both Houses of Parliament; and therefore, although having been somewhat hardened by the experience of office these matters scarcely affected him, he felt he ought not to allow the charge to pass; for had it been brought against any one more new to the office than he was it might have been more distressing to another Peer than it was to himself. It was for their Lordships to guard their officers against such charges. He believed Mr. France to be so extremely wrong-headed that it was almost impossible to remove any false impression he entertained. For instance, he persisted in asserting that the Select Committee to which the Bill in question was referred passed the preamble of the Bill; whereas the Committee reported that they did not enter upon the consideration of the Bill because the opposition was withdrawn; while the Standing Orders laid it down that when opposition was withdrawn a Bill was referred to the Chairman of Committees, as if it had been originally unopposed. Under these circumstances, it was impossible the Committee could have declared the preamble proved. He did not think it necessary to press their Lordships to take any steps with regard to Mr. France; he was perfectly satisfied to leave the matter entirely in their Lordships' hands, believing that they were the best judges of what ought to be done under the circumstances. He was rather disposed to suggest that Mr. France was utterly unworthy of their Lordships' further attention.

LORD TAUNTON, as one of the Committee to which Mr. France's pamphlet had been referred, in answer to the noble Chairman of Committee's complaint as to the form in which the matter was referred to the Committee, said it would have been most improper for the Committee, after the lapse of two years, to revive the original question as to the character of the clause, and to determine whether it was a proper clause or not. The question referred to the late Committee was not whether the clause was a proper or an improper one, but whether it was properly introduced by the noble Lord as Chairman of Committees; and he had no hesitation in saying that there could be no doubt that the noble Lord acted with entire regularity and in accordance with the well-known Rules and Standing Orders of the House. Whether the clause was a right one or a wrong one—on which the Committee expressed no opinion—he was bound, as a member of the Committee, to say that he considered the noble Lord was entirely cleared of the charge brought against him. He was glad to hear the noble Lord say that, under the circumstances, he did not press for any ulterior measures against Mr. France, who did not impute any corrupt motive to the noble Lord, and, after all, the noble Lord, occupying the position he did, must not be too thin-skinned, as to a certain extent his official conduct was exposed to public criticism. He did not deny the right of public criticism on occasions of this kind—on the contrary, he thought the public derived great advantage from criticism when fairly conducted. But on this occasion he thought the noble Lord had not merited the charge brought against him—he had acted strictly according to the Rules of the House, and had exercised a sound discretion. He entertained as high an opinion as any man of the value of the services which the noble Lord rendered as Chairman of Committees.

THE DUKE OF MARLBOROUGH would make but very few remarks on this subject, as he could only re-echo the opinions of the noble Lord who had just sat down. The question in dispute was one not of opinion, but of fact. The Committee, of which he was a member, had experienced no difficulty in arriving at a conclusion, inasmuch as they had merely to investigate a number of facts, to ascertain whether there had been any irregularity in the conduct of the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees. There really could be no doubt on the subject, for the question did not depend on the veracity of witnesses. The truth was arrived at by the easiest possible means—there was no difference of opinion—every member of the Committee came to the conclusion that there was not the slightest foundation for the charge brought against the noble Lord who for so long a time, and with such great reputation, had held the position of Chairman of Committees. He did not know what course the House might choose to adopt on the present occasion; but as the statements made with regard to the noble Lord who held so responsible a position in that House might in some degree implicate the House itself, it might, perhaps, be proper that some action should be taken in order to vindicate the propriety and integrity with which the noble Lord had acted.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he entirely agreed with what had been said by the two last speakers as to the integrity with which the noble Lord had performed his duties, and that there was no ground whatever for the charge which had been made against him. He agreed, too, with the statement of his noble Friend who had just sat down as to the facility with which the Committee had arrived at its conclusion. He, in common, he believed, with all the other Members of the Committee, had that morning received a letter from Mr. France, and had been requested to read it to their Lordships; but this he should decline to do, because he thought no further proceedings ought to be taken with reference to the merits of the clause or of the Bill. He was glad the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees had brought this matter before the House, and he hoped this occurrence would be considered deeply with a view to amend the system of legislation respecting Railway Bills. He had on several occasions drawn attention to the subject, and it was well-known that his opinion in regard to it differed from that entertained by many of their Lordships. This Bill was a striking illustration of the mischievous and ruinous results of our system of legislation for railways. The effect of the system was felt all over the kingdom, and it had caused such a waste of money, labour, and time as no other country could have endured. In the present instance the railway was not one which had been got up by contractors. The Bill was introduced and referred to a Committee of the House of Lords. It was opposed by a great Company, and the parties interested in the Bill were consequently put to the expense of counsel, witnesses, and so forth. Now what happened? When the Bill was opened, the counsel for the opponents got up and declared on the part of his clients, the great Company, that he did not think it necessary to offer any further opposition to the Bill, which, therefore, went straight to the Chairman of Committees as an unopposed Bill. When it got into his room the agent of the opponents of the Bill appeared before the noble Lord and proposed the insertion of a clause which was said to be a usual one; but if that were the case it might be asked why it had not been introduced into the Bill at an earlier period? About £200,000, he understood, had been already expended upon the railway, which, however, would under this clause be entirely delivered up to the mercy of the great Company which opposed it, unless another Act of Parliament were passed on the subject. The agent for the opposition told the Select Committee that it was intended to effect a compromise before the Bill was withdrawn; but that the clerk omitted to carry out this intention by inserting the clause. But the agent did not state that the clerk had received instructions to make any such condition or compromise. He did not wish to throw any doubt whatever on the statement of the Parliamentary agent; but, supposing that that gentleman was acting solely in the interest of his clients, he knew well enough that the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees thought it was right to insert the clause. Of course, his noble Friend acted upon his own judgment, and he did not for a moment say that he had arrived at a wrong conclusion. What he objected to was that in the case of an unopposed Bill there was no protection whatever against the introduction of clauses except the decision of his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees. Such a system could not be regarded as satisfactory. The subject was of the highest importance, and some measure to remedy the defects of the existing system would, he hoped, be introduced by the Government.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the noble Marquess had carried them a little away from the subject; he would endeavour to bring them back to it. His noble Friend the Chairman of Committees had placed himself entirely in the hands of their Lordships as to the mode in which they should deal with the Report of the Committee on Mr. France's pamphlet. After the observations which had been made by several of their Lordships, he had little difficulty in stating his opinion as to the course which the House ought to pursue—not for the purpose of vindicating his noble Friend from the charge of having improperly exercised his functions as Chairman of Committees, which he had for so long a time discharged so ably and impartially, but for the purpose of dealing with Mr. France. After the observations of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde), it would be perhaps as well that their Lordships should be reminded of what had so offended Mr. France as to lead him to publish the pamphlet. Mr. France was a contractor and a promoter of the Mold and Denbigh Junction Railway Extension Bill. The opposition to the Bill in question having been withdrawn, it went before his noble Friend, in accordance with the Standing Order, as an unopposed Bill. He considered the Bill in the common way; and the proviso having been proposed by the agents of the London and North-Western Railway Company, his noble Friend heard those gentlemen and also the agents of the promoters. The clause proposed was, he understood, a very common one in Bills for junctions; and the Chairman of Committees, in the exercise of his judgment, came to the conclusion that it was one which ought to be inserted in the Bill before him. But the way in which it should be introduced by the House was on the third reading; so that before it was made part of the Bill, Mr. France and all other persons interested had full notice. Mr. France, being ignorant of the forms of the House, when the opposition was withdrawn thought that the Committee had necessarily declared the preamble proved, and that therefore no alteration could be made in the Bill, although, before their Lordships' Committee, evidence was given in Mr. France's presence to show that it was a justifiable proceeding. He was then displeased at finding this Amendment and wrote the angry letter which nothing could justify; a Select Committee had inquired into the charges made, and reported that they were utterly unfounded. Their Lordships would observe that Mr. France did not make any charge against the character of the Chairman of Committees of having acted partially or improperly. What he did charge was, that the noble Lord had inserted the clause under an arbitrary exercise of authority. From the tone of Mr. France's pamphlet, from his correspondence with the noble Lord, and from his conduct before the Select Committee, he believed nothing would give Mr. France greater pleasure than being called to the Bar of their Lordships' House and reprimanded by the Lord Chancellor. He, for one, was not disposed to afford Mr. France that pleasure. As the judgment of the Select Committee and of their Lordships' House would, he felt sure, be ratified by the public, what Mr. France might think of his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees must, he presumed, be a matter of indifference to that noble Lord. Under these circumstances, he would ask the House to deal with the matter by passing the following Resolution:—

The Marquess of Clanricarde

"That this House adopts the Report of the Select Committee on Mr. France's Pamphlet, which was arrived at after an Inquiry in which Mr. France had an Opportunity of being fully heard, and expresses its entire Confidence in the Integrity and Impartiality of the Chairman of Committees in the Discharge of his Duties."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

On Question, agreed to.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE— ELECTORS IN CITIES AND BOROUGHES.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

EARL RUSSELL: My Lords, I rise to move for Returns on the subject of the franchise. My purpose in bringing this Motion before your Lordships is two-fold. In the first place, I desire to call attention to certain proceedings which have been adopted with reference to a reform of the representation of the people in Parliament; and, in the next place, to call attention to the present state of that question. I presume no one will deny that this House is as much interested as any part of the country whatever in the representation of the people in Parliament. On the question whether the House of Commons is well or ill constituted depend the weal and woe of this country in the future as well as at the present time; and therefore I will make no apology for calling your Lordships' attention to this subject. Your Lordships will recollect that in the Queen's Speech the attention of the two Houses of Parliament was directed to it; and on the same day, the 5th of February, the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave notice that on the following Monday he would make a statement with reference to Reform to the House of Commons. Every one must have given credit to the Government for the promptitude with which it appeared Her Majesty's Government were about to proceed with the question, and the unanimity of the Government in their opinions. Accordingly, on the Monday following, the right hon. Gentleman did make a statement; but it was so obscure that it was impossible for any one to gather from it what were the precise intentions of Her Majesty's Government. On the next day a series of Resolutions were laid on the table of the House of Commons; but from these it would have been as difficult, without further explanation, to decide what the Government intended. But after some time it appeared that they had changed their purpose of proceeding by Resolution, although no opposition had been made to their proceeding by that method; and it was announced that a Bill would be brought in, the Chancellor of the Exchequer stating to the House of Commons what the main features of that Bill would be. That, I think, was on the 23rd of February. In the beginning of March both Houses of Parliament were told that a change of opinion had occurred; that the Bill which had been announced would not be brought in; and that a Bill grounded upon the principle of the Resolutions would at once be introduced. It is a course entirely without precedent—it is a course which shows great vacillation on the part of Her Majesty's Government in that which was supposed at first to have been unanimously propounded. In the course of the speech in which that statement was made, opportunity was taken to state that the operation of the original Reform Bill has been to exclude the working classes from the franchise; it was said, moreover, as I am told by a Minister of the Crown, that the present Ministers are now about to restore to the working classes those franchises of which hitherto they have been deprived, and to do them that justice which hitherto has been denied to them. Such a statement induced me to look back to see what actually passed at the time of the Reform Bill, and also what has occurred since with regard to the number of persons disfranchised. If your Lordships will permit me, I will cite what I stated to the House of Commons on the occasion of the second reading of the Reform Bill which afterwards passed through Parliament. I said—

"It is, therefore, desirable to fix upon a class of persons, who shall partake largely of the popular spirit, and yet not constitute a body hostile to property, or debased by ignorance. In order to effect this it will be advisable to bring into action the more intelligent of the working class in the large towns, and the more respectable of the middle class in the small boroughs."—[3 Hansard, ix. 497]

I then gave an account of what would happen at Leeds, where the working classes would be generally excluded, and proceeded as follows :—

"I do not say, certainly, that the working classes will be excluded, generally, in large towns to the same extent that they will be in Leeds. I should be sorry to think that such would be the case. The operation of time and the growth of our manufactures have produced that anomaly in our Constitution—a mass of industrious, intelligent, prosperous men, without any direct tie binding them to our Government. . . . It is an object with every sound Reformer to reclaim this powerful tribe from the political desert to which they have been confined ; to recall them from wild prospects and hostile schemes, in order to bind them to our institutions, to make them a part of the great family of the Constitution, partaking in all its privileges and defending it in all its dangers."—[500.]

That was the promise and the profession of the Reform Bill of 1831, and the consequence was that, though the working classes were not admitted to the extent we had wished, or that we should have been glad at the time that they could have been admitted, they were still admitted to a considerable extent. In such places as Leeds, Birmingham, Manchester, Sheffield, and other places, none of the working classes had been previously admitted to the franchise, and Lord Liverpool and Lord Castlereagh were, to the end of their lives, opposed to the enfranchisement of those great towns. I in vain endeavoured to induce the House of Commons to permit three of those towns to send representatives to Parliament. In looking over the different Returns, I find that in twelve of the thirty-nine boroughs created by the Reform Bill, there were more than 25 per cent of the electors composed of the working classes ; in thirteen others there were from 15 to 25 per cent of the electors so composed ; and in twelve others there were under 15 per cent. On the whole, by the Reform Act, there were 58,000 of the working classes admitted to the franchise who never had votes before. I find, likewise, from the Returns presented to Parliament last year by Her Majesty's command, that there were 70,000 more in the old towns belonging to the working classes who were admitted to the franchise. In certain towns there were some, undoubtedly, who were deprived of their franchise. In some these were scot and lot voters, in others these were the ordinary freemen, and in some they were persons who held under burgage tenures. Altogether there appear to have been about 57,000 persons who since the Reform Act have been by death or otherwise removed from the privilege of forming part of the electoral body ; while, as I have already said, there were 58,000 of the working classes to whom for the first time we gave the suffrage. The whole body contains therefore a large number less, not of the working classes, but of those who had the special franchises. With regard to the representation generally, it was the opinion of the Government of that day that there had been so many abuses at elections, that even in the few populous boroughs which existed there had been so much of bribery, treating, and corrupt practices, that it was better to have a body entirely new, and both in the old and new boroughs to give the franchise to persons holding premises of a certain money value. Undoubtedly, the first consequence of that step was that the substantial part of the elective body consisted of the middle classes ; I have never denied that consequence—I always thought that it tended to the stability of our institutions ; and I think your Lordships will agree with me that during the time that has elapsed since the passing of the Reform Act the electoral body, generally speaking, has maintained harmony with the rest of our institutions, and has, in the words which King William IV., by advice of Lord Grey, addressed to Parliament—

Earl Russell

"Adhered to the principles of the Constitution, by which the prerogatives of the Crown, the privileges of the two Houses of Parliament, and the rights and liberties of the people were equally secured."

It was, I think, owing to the perseverance of Lord Grey, and owing to the eloquence with which he maintained in this House all the popular principles embodied in the Reform Act—especially the disfranchisement of the small close boroughs, which had become a scandal to the country—that the measure was carried triumphantly. Your Lordships will have seen lately a work which contains the correspondence of Earl Grey with his Sovereign, William IV. Everyone who reads that book must be of opinion that it was impossible to combine in a greater degree the respect and loyalty due to his Sovereign with the sincere maintenance of popular principles. It is the praise bestowed by one of our poets upon books that they speak the truth, and—

"To various people tell not various things,
But what they say to subjects say to kings."

Lord Grey in this respect resembled a volume, never concealing from his Sovereign what he was saying to his subjects, and never ceasing to impress upon those subjects the loyalty which he invariably expressed to his Sovereign. Having thus stated to your Lordships the provisions of the Reform Act, I do not see, as has been elsewhere asserted, that it deprives the working classes of votes; but, on the contrary, by giving representatives to thirty-seven towns which never before had any, it increased the power of the working classes. In 1851 it became the opinion of the Government, of which I was then at the head, that some further change should be made, regard being had to the great increase of wealth in the country, and to the great increase in the number not on the electoral roll; and, at the same time, that advantage should be taken of this opportunity to extend the right of voting given to tenants-at-will in counties. That franchise given to tenants-at-will in counties certainly did not meet with my support. Although I was not present at the time when it was carried, the grounds on which I objected to it have been very much misrepresented. It has been stated that I objected to the enfranchisement of the farmers of England; the real fact is that I thought it quite right that the franchise should be extended to occupation, but I thought £50 too high a sum at which to place the occupation franchise in counties. I believe that if, instead of proposing £50 as the limit, it had been proposed to give the franchise to £20 occupiers, that franchise would have lasted much longer and provoked fewer complaints; whereas repeated proposals have been made that it should be reduced to £10 in counties, as in boroughs. In 1851 I suggested, and in 1852 I proposed, a Bill founded on these two principles, that of admitting a greater number of the working classes to the franchise in boroughs and that of reducing the amount of the occupation franchise in counties. It has been stated over and over again, and it is one of those popular sayings that pass without contradiction, that five Reform Bills have been introduced and five have failed. That is not a correct statement of the fact; for the Bill proposed in 1852 never came to any debate whatever in Parliament. The Government resigned, and the noble Earl opposite came into office. I did not think it my duty then to raise the question, nor was the question raised by the then existing Government; and, consequently, that Bill cannot be said to have failed, for it never was brought forward for discussion. I have been told again with regard to the Bill of 1854, which had the assent of Sir James Graham, Sir Charles Wood, and others, that it likewise was a failure. But the fact is that this Bill also was never brought forward for discussion, because the Russian war intervened and effectually prevented any debate on the subject. Three Bills, however, have been actually introduced and discussed; there was one in 1859, another in 1860, by the Government of Lord Palmerston, and a third last year. Having, my Lords, given frequent and much attention to the subject of Reform, I venture to intrude upon your Lordships some remarks with regard to the principles upon which it is said the Bill now in contemplation may be based.

THE EARL OF DERBY: I feel bound to rise to order. The noble Earl has already taken great latitude in commenting upon what is said to have been said in "another place;" but I certainly must take exception to his remarks with regard to the supposed principles of a Bill which has not yet been introduced to Parliament, and of which it is absolutely impossible for us, as a House, to know anything whatever.

EARL RUSSELL: I do not wish to comment upon the principles of a Bill which has not yet been introduced to the House of Commons; but I think I have a right to comment upon that which is discussed in the public papers almost every day with reference to the manner in which a measure of Reform ought to be constructed so as to give satisfaction to the country. It is very commonly said that the only way of framing a permanent Bill—a Bill founded on a sound principle—is to return to the old scot and lot franchise in boroughs, and this assertion appears to meet with general consent. Now, this is a subject we had under consideration in a small Committee, and afterwards in the Cabinet, at the time of the original Reform Bill; it has since been discussed over and over again, and I have recently turned my attention to the question as to whether it is now a fit principle to base a Reform Bill upon. I have come to the conclusion that, although it is natural to regard this as the old principle of the Constitution, and to take it as a basis in our attempt to fix the franchise for the future, yet it would be found extremely difficult, though perhaps not impossible, to adapt such a principle to the present state of society. In the 17th century, when the famous Glanville Committee stated that scot and lot was the principle upon which the franchise ought to be founded, those who paid scot and lot were the great substantial burgesses of the towns; it was from them that the Chancellor of the Exchequer obtained revenue for the support of the Crown; and they were the persons who were called upon to defend the country in case of invasion. But the state of society for many years past has been totally different, and it is different at the present time. I have examined the Returns to find whether any great change would be made in the list of electors in London if every person who is rated as the occupant of a tenement were given a vote, and I find that there would be scarcely any change. In Westminster perhaps one or two persons would obtain the franchise, and in some of the metropolitan boroughs six or seven, forty or fifty in another. The reason that no essential change would be made by the introduction of this principle is that the greater portion of artizans, artists, clerks, and professional men live in lodgings and are not householders in the legal sense; although it would be impossible not to include them in any reformation of the franchise. Then, again, there is a large class of persons in the country called "compound householders" who, by an arrangement made first by an Act of 59 Geo. III., and afterwards by an Act of the present reign, have their rates paid by their landlords. The rate collectors rely upon the landlord, who is re-paid by the tenant when he pays his rent. Any franchise, then, which will not admit both the lodger and the compound householders will be imperfect. I should say, therefore, that if Parliament were to resolve upon anything like scot and lot as the basis of a Reform Bill, that basis must be departed from, not partially, but almost totally, by admitting, first, lodgers, and, in the next place, compound householders. We are told, however, that to give the franchise to lodgers paying a certain amount would not be a permanent franchise, because the sum paid might be reduced from time to time. But if you once admitted lodgers without naming any sum, you would then arrive, as nearly as possible, to that which the Reform League has asked by the mouth of Mr. Potter in Trafalgar Square—that is, manhood suffrage with simple residence, and with no condition whatever as to the money value of that residence. It appears to me that the principle first set forth by the Committee of the 17th century can with great difficulty be adopted at the present time; and, if that be the case, I cannot see how you can maintain that what is not fitted for the present constitution of society would make a sound permanent basis for a Reform Bill. The measure which I had the honour to introduce in the House of Commons, and which the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) sustained in that House with an eloquence which defeated all its opponents, has now, for thirty-five years, been the law of the country; it has contributed to the establishment of the municipal corporations; it has contributed to the registration of the Births and Marriages of Dissenters; it has contributed to the establishment of Free Trade; and, whatever changes you may now make with respect to it, I doubt whether you can improve the foundation on which it is based. If it be required, as I think it is required, that the best of the working classes should be added to the electors throughout the country, I do not think you should make such a total change as will swamp altogether the middle classes, and make them without weight or power in this country. I beg leave to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that there be laid before this House—

Earl Russell

1. A List in alphabetical Order of the Cities and Boroughs in England and Wales returning Members to Parliament previously to the passing of the Act 2d and 3d Will. IV. Cap. 45., and stating the Nature of the Suffrage existing in each City and Borough:

2. A Return showing the Number of Electors in each City and Borough in England and Wales for 1865-66, classed according to the several Qualifications in respect of which they are entitled to vote; and the Number of such Electors who come within the Description of Mechanics, Artizans, and other Persons supporting themselves by daily manual Labour, classed in like Manner:

3. The Number of Electors made out from the foregoing Return, distinguishing those who come within the Description of Mechanics, Artizans, and other Persons supporting themselves by daily manual Labour in the Cities and Boroughs entitled to return Members to Parliament before the passing of the Reform Act, and distinguishing the Mechanics, Artizans, and other working Men entitled to vote as Scot and Lot Voters, Potwallers, and other ancient Right Qualifications from those entitled to vote as Freemen or as £10 Occupiers :

4. A similar Return of Mechanics, Artizans, &c. in Cities and Boroughs entitled to return Members to Parliament for the first Time by the Act 2d and 3d Will. IV. Cap. 45. ; and also in the Borough of Birkenhead.—(The Earl Russell.)

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I must say that I have heard with the most unfeigned astonishment the speech of the noble Earl who has just sat down. I came down to your Lordships' House expecting to hear that he was about to ask for information to enable him more completely than we can, or are supposed to be able at present, to judge of a measure which, at no very distant period, Her Majesty's Government intend to bring under the consideration of the other House of Parliament. I listened to his speech, but the noble Earl has not given us any reason for his asking for this information, he has not vouchsafed a word on the subject of his Motion ; he has indulged in a series of autobiographical reminiscences which are, no doubt, exceedingly interesting to your Lordships, and especially so to the noble Earl himself. He has gone back to the 17th century ; he has discussed the principle of a Reform Bill in the passing of which I took a humble part, though I did not stand in regard to it in so prominent a position as the noble Earl himself ; and he has given us a history of the measures of Reform introduced by various Governments since 1851 ; but with regard to the Returns, for which he has an undoubted right to move, and as far as his Motion is intelligible to me I shall be most happy to give him, not a single word has fallen from his lips during the lengthened period which he has addressed your Lordships. I hope he will not think me disrespectful if I decline to follow him in any charges which he has made against the present Government, on account of the course which it has pursued during this Session ; the circumstances under which it laboured I have already had an opportunity of explaining to your Lordships at length. Nor am I about to discuss the merits of the Chandos clause, or the peculiar qualities of a £10 franchise as the basis for a Reform Bill. There is no question that the Reform Bill introduced in 1831 imported into the constituencies of the country a very large number of the working classes beyond those who previously held the franchise ;

but the noble Earl somewhat irregularly referred to the statement which has been made elsewhere that while the Reform Bill introduced a large number of the working classes, it also excluded from the constituencies of many boroughs a very considerable portion of the working classes who exercised their rights under different franchises which the Bill abolished ; and this the noble Earl does not deny. Whether it was wise to do this or not in some respects, I say it was certainly a mistake to abolish all those various franchises which gave a degree of variety to the electoral body of this country, and, instead, to bring the whole down to the dead level of a £10 occupation. The noble Earl admits that since 1830 the effect of the gradual extinction of their existing rights, and the termination of existing interests, has been to strike off a very large number—I think he said, 58,000 persons—belonging to the working classes from the electoral lists. These were composed partly of freemen, partly of potwallopers, partly of freeholders, and partly of others having ancient rights to vote ; and they have all been swept away by the Bill championed by the noble Earl, who believes it is the intention of the Bill about to be introduced to restore a certain number of these franchises to the working classes. Now, my Lords, the noble Earl has been kind enough to give us a sketch of what he thinks ought to be and what ought not to be introduced into the Reform Bill. He will excuse me if I say it is better at present to abstain from the discussion of abstract principles of Reform, or what is or is not likely to be in the coming Reform Bill, and I must respectfully decline to discuss his argument in this respect. Now, my Lords, I will not say another word with regard to the speech of the noble Earl ; but, with reference to the Returns for which he has moved, I wish to ask an explanation of what appears to me to be perfectly incomprehensible. About the first part of the Motion of the noble Earl there can be no difficulty whatever. The second Return is one that was furnished by Her Majesty's late Government in the course of last Session. It is very voluminous ; but it was laid on the table of the House of Commons and there was no objection to its production. It contains—

“ The number of electors in each city and borough in England and Wales for 1865-6, classed according to the several qualifications in respect to which they are entitled to vote ; and the number of such electors who come within the description of mechanics, artizans, and other persons supporting themselves by daily manual labour, classed in like manner."

But as regards the third Return for which the noble Earl has moved, I want to know how he can ascertain, from a Return relating to the state of constituencies in 1865-6—

"The number of mechanics, artizans, and other persons supporting themselves by daily manual labour in the cities and boroughs entitled to return Members to Parliament before the passing of the Reform Act."

How is it possible, from the Return of 1865-6, to make a Return showing the state of the constituencies in 1831?

EARL RUSSELL: It does not mean the number of persons entitled to vote in 1831, but the number of persons in 1865, in the boroughs which now remain after the passing of the Reform Act.

THE EARL OF DERBY: But there is nothing said about that in the Return moved by the noble Earl. All the boroughs disfranchised by the Reform Act are, in fact, included in the second Return of the noble Earl, the electors of which he asks to be made out from the Return of 1865-6. How are we to distinguish the mechanics and artizans, and other working men who were entitled as scot and lot voters, from those who were entitled as freemen? If the noble Earl only means to apply for those included in the second Resolution, the rest is all surplusage; because the noble Earl can attain his objects by moving, as an addition to the second Resolution—

"The number of Electors in the Cities and Boroughs in 1865-6, distinguishing those who were entitled to send Members to Parliament previous to the passing of the Reform Act, from those who were so entitled since the passing of that Act."

If the noble Earl will strike out the last two Resolutions, and amend the second in the way I have suggested, showing the distinction laid down, there cannot be the slightest objection to furnish the Returns asked for.

EARL RUSSELL: I think the Resolutions are perfectly intelligible as they stand, but I have no objection to amend them as suggested by the noble Earl.

Motion agreed to.

1. A List in alphabetical Order of the Cities and Boroughs in England and Wales returning Members to Parliament previously to the passing of the Act 2d and 3d Will. IV. Cap. 45., and stating the Nature of the Suffrage existing in each City and Borough:

The Earl of Derby

2. A Return showing the Number of Electors in each City and Borough in England and Wales for 1865-66, classed according to the several Qualifications in respect of which they are entitled to vote; and the Number of such Electors who come within the Description of Mechanics, Artizans, and other Persons supporting themselves by daily manual Labour, classed in like Manner; distinguishing those Cities and Boroughs which were entitled to return Members to Parliament previous to the passing of the 2d and 3d Will. IV. Cap. 45. from those which have been enfranchised by that Act, including the Borough of Birkenhead.—(The Earl Russell.)

House adjourned at half past
Six o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, March 11, 1867.

MINUTES.]—NEW WRIT ISSUED—For Boston, v. Meaburn Staniland, esquire, Manor of Northstead.

NEW MEMBER SWORN—Hon. Percy Egerton Herbert, for Salop (Southern Division).

SELECT COMMITTEE—On Limited Liability Acts, Mr. William Edward Forster added.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Sale of Land by Auction* [70].

Second Reading—Valuation of Property [12].

Committed to Select Committee—Valuation of Property [12].

Committee—Metropolitan Poor (re-comm.) [66]; Consolidated Fund (£369,118 5s. 6d.)*

Report—Metropolitan Poor (re-comm.) [66]; Consolidated Fund (£369,118 5s. 6d.)*

Considered as amended—Sugar Duties [37].

Third Reading—Shipping Local Dues* [5]; Duty on Dogs* [36], and passed.

THE NEW NATIONAL GALLERY.

QUESTION.

MR. JULIAN GOLDSMID said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the following statement, contained in a letter addressed to him by the architects competing for the New National Gallery, is not correct, namely—

"We agreed to enter the competition on the distinct understanding with your Lordship's predecessor, the Right Hon. W. Cowper, that one of the competing architects would be selected for employment;"

and, whether he does not therefore intend to intrust the erection of the new building to one of those gentlemen?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Sir, I do not well understand the object of the hon.

Member's Question, nor in what sense he expects me to answer it. If he means whether I place implicit reliance on a statement made by ten gentlemen of high honour and great professional eminence, I answer decidedly in the affirmative, that I do place implicit reliance on their statement. But if he means to ask if I find in the records of the Office of Works any corroboration of that statement, I am bound to say that on looking at the papers I do not find any corroboration of that statement. With respect to the second Question of the hon. Gentleman, he is no doubt aware that the Judges, in their Report, do not give any recommendation as to the re-construction of the existing National Gallery or the building of a new one. That question, therefore, is left to the consideration of the Government. It is now under their consideration, and I cannot therefore say what course may be adopted with respect either to the re-construction of the old building or the execution of a new one. When that decision is arrived at, I cannot doubt that Government will give every consideration to the agreement stated to have been entered into with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Cowper) by the competing architects.

THE DUTCH IN SUMATRA.—QUESTION.

MR. WHITE said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he will lay upon the table of the House the Correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and the Netherlands Government relating to Dutch encroachments on Native States in Sumatra, and also copy of any Memorials thereon presented by British Merchants at Penang?

LORD STANLEY: Sir, the correspondence to which the hon. Gentleman's Question refers extends over a long course of years. It is exceedingly voluminous, and I have not had time to look into it since the notice appeared; but I will have it examined, and any papers that can be laid before the House without public inconvenience shall be produced.

INDIA—FAMINE IN ORISSA.

QUESTION.

MR. BARNES said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, When he expects to receive the Report of the Commission appointed by the Governor General of India on the 8th December last to "elicit full information" concerning the recent famine in Orissa; and whether he will lay the Report on the table of the House as soon as it arrives?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON, in reply, said, it was impossible to say when the Report would arrive, but it would be laid on the table without loss of time. The inquiry was still being prosecuted.

THE REFORM BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If Boroughs which are perfectly uncorrupt as well as thoroughly independent, and at the same time are towns of great local importance and centres of trade and commerce over large districts in the Country, are to be called upon to lose a Member in order to promote Reform, on what grounds it is proposed that certain others, which are mere proprietary and nomination Boroughs, and which habitually obey the command of their patron in the election of a Member, are to be exempted from making a corresponding sacrifice?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, the inquiry of my hon. Friend, although distinguished by his usual acuteness, does not appear to me to fall within the legitimate limits of Questions such as are put in this House. The inquiry of my hon. Friend is founded upon a series of assumptions which may or may not be true, but which can only be established or refuted, not by answering a question, but by a process of debate and discussion. I hope my hon. Friend will, on further consideration, keep this subject for the impending debate on the Reform Bill rather than expect me to give an answer. If therefore I decline to answer a Question which I could not do without making a speech, I trust that my hon. Friend will not think that I am showing any disrespect to him.

INDIA—THE STRAITS SETTLEMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. O'REILLY said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for India, Whether any communication has passed between the India Office and the Governor of the Straits Settlement and the other Indian Officers there as to their removal from their posts by the Secretary for the Colonies; and, if so, what was its date, and whether subsequent to the publication in the newspapers of the appointment of their successors by the Secretary for the Colonies?

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, that the Secretary of State for India took the earliest opportunity of communicating to the Governor General of India, and to the Governor of the Straits Settlements, the intentions of the Colonial Office. He did not wait for the official intimation of the intentions of the Colonial Office; but on the 18th of January he privately ascertained the course which the Colonial Secretary was likely to pursue. He communicated on the same day to the Governor General that the Governor of the Straits Settlements would not be continued in his office, but that a member of the Colonial Staff would be appointed in his place. He received further information on the 29th of January, and he sent at once a confirmation of his previous despatch. The appointment of the new Governor was gazetted on the 5th of February.

ARMY ESTIMATES.—QUESTION. †

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he wished to know, When it was the intention of the Government to proceed with the Army Estimates and the Supplementary Estimates?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War would not be in his place on Friday, but that a Vote on account would be taken on that evening to enable hon. Members to proceed with their Questions.

IRELAND—MARTIAL LAW.

QUESTION.

THE O'DONOGHUE: Sir, a rumour having reached me this morning which caused me great alarm, but which, I hope, is not true, I deemed it my duty, early this morning, to give the Secretary of State for the Home Department notice of the following Question:—

“As it is rumoured that the Irish Government intend to proclaim Martial Law, to explain fully to the House the nature and effect of the increased powers which the Proclamation of Martial Law will place in the hands of the authorities, Civil and Military?”

MR. WALPOLE: In answer, Sir, to the Question of the hon. Gentleman, I have to state that there is no intention at present, and I hope, on the part of the Government, there will be no necessity to proclaim martial law in Ireland. Should any occasion occur for it, the House will be informed of any powers which the Government may think it right to ask for that purpose. As to the necessity of proclaiming martial law, the accounts which I have received from Dublin yesterday and this morning are more favourable than they have been for some days; and I can state to the House that the ordinary law of the land will be had recourse to without delay. A Special Commission will be issued to bring the offenders to speedy trial. I am sure that hon. Members connected with Ireland will be gratified to hear a telegram I have received to-day, and which I know is confirmed by others. The hon. Member for Dublin has, I believe, received a similar one—

Mr. O'Reilly

“Messrs. Malcolmson, Brothers, state that out of 3,000 persons employed by them at Waterford, Carrick, Portlaw, and Clonmel, not one has left his work to join the insurgents.”

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE— REFORM STATISTICS.—QUESTION.

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

MR. LOCKE said, he wished to inquire, Whether the Government would lay on the table the statistics referred to by the noble Viscount (Viscount Cranbourne) as having been laid before the Cabinet a fortnight since?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: No papers have been before the Cabinet which have not been laid on the table of the House. I believe that the House is in possession of all the information the Cabinet have. I have, however, given instructions that for the convenience of Members certain new information shall be prepared and printed, but I regret that it is not yet ready. I am unable to account for the delay, but I will make inquiry as to the reason.

MR. HORSMAN: We understood from the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranbourne) that certain figures were given to him and other Members of the Cabinet on which they were to found their opinion as to the measure that was to be proposed. The noble Lord said that those figures at first sight appeared to be favourable to the proposal, but on a closer examination did not. It is desirable that the House should see what were the figures before the noble Lord and the other seceding Members of the Cabinet on which they were to come to a conclusion.

I wish to make my Question intelligible, so I will conclude with a Motion. As we are approaching very near to the time when we shall have to consider the measure of the Government, surely we ought to have before us the best information they can give us. My hon. Friend has asked for what I think we are entitled to receive—namely, the figures which were supplied to the noble Lord and his late Colleagues to enable them to judge of the real bearing and effect of the measure that was to be introduced by the Government. It is obvious that out of the information laid on the table certain figures were extracted, embodied in some form or other, and submitted to the noble Lord. It is desirable that the House also should have that information before it. I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Horsman.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not think a Reform discussion would be very convenient to the House at this moment. Whatever information may come before the Cabinet shall be placed before the House. I believe, however, that in that information there is likely to be nothing very novel. At the same time, it is possible that some further information may be furnished to the House, and I undertake that it shall be in the hands of the Members very shortly.

VISCOUNT CRANBOURNE: As I alluded to this subject on a former occasion, it is necessary, in order to make my own statement clear, that I should say that I understood, when certain figures were laid before the Cabinet, that they were figures which had been obtained from the Departments for that purpose, and that they were new. So I understood them; but, of course, in that I may have been mistaken. They were exceedingly scanty and few in number, and the investigation of which I spoke was mainly directed to comparing these figures which were sums total with the more detailed information contained in the voluminous Returns laid before the House last year.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

VALUATION OF PROPERTY BILL.

(Mr. Hunt, Mr. Secretary Walpole, Mr. Gathorne Hardy.)

[BILL 12.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Hunt.)

COLONEL BARTTELOT said, that while giving credit to his hon. Friend for bringing in a Bill of that nature, he could not but remember that it was no further back than 1862 that the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. C. P. Villiers) introduced a measure to amend assessments. That measure had scarcely yet had a fair trial, and it could hardly be known yet what the result of the valuations under it was, though he believed the result was eminently satisfactory. Those valuations had been made with a care and a disinterestedness which ought to receive great consideration from that House, and if that Act were amended very slightly it would effect all that the present Bill was intended to do. Before the valuations under the Act of 1862 had been sufficiently tested by practice, was it not premature to call on the House to legislate on the subject? Those who had great experience of this matter in his part of the country universally said that this Bill was unnecessary, that it was, moreover, so complicated that it could not be carried out, and also that it was unjust to force upon them a re-valuation until the old system had been fairly tried. They went further, and maintained that until the old valuation had been fairly proved to be insufficient his hon. Friend ought not to have brought in that Bill. There were three main points in the measure which were totally different from anything they had had before. The first was the formation of a Central Valuation Board. Perhaps there might be in many counties and unions great differences as to the deductions made in these valuations; and when the Act of 1862 was under discussion he had himself urged that there should be laid down in it some definite basis for deductions as a guide in respect to all rates. The right hon. Member for Wolverhampton, however, said that could not be done, and it was not done in that Act. But, taking the country through, he believed there had been an anxious endeavour on the part of those who had to carry out that Act to arrive as far as possible at a satisfactory conclusion. When the Act came into force, in most counties a committee was appointed which went most carefully into the details of the measure, and into the subject of these deductions. And, although those committees could not, of course, by law enforce the rule as to deductions at which they arrived, yet, generally speaking, the assessment committees in each county had carried out the scale of deductions so laid down. He believed that the deductions had been fairly made, and that any necessary amendments might have easily been effected without introducing the present Act. The second novelty in this Bill was that they were to have surveyors of taxes introduced—a proposal to which great objection was entertained in the country. These surveyors of taxes were to have it in their power to revise, as it were, the valuation lists, and to say that certain things were not right, and that the rates must be raised. Those who attended appeals in respect to income tax knew that the class whose assessments were raised were the poor tradespeople, who would often rather pay than by appealing perhaps suffer damage in their credit. And if owners of property, for the benefit of their poor tenants or neighbours, consented to let cottages at the moderate rents of from £3 to £7, the surveyor of taxes might come and say the cottages ought to be put down at a great deal more, and thus one means of improvement would be checked. No doubt the surveyor of taxes might sometimes find out something that was wrong; but the odium and inconvenience that would result, would more than counterbalance all the advantage which the Treasury could derive from his appointment. The third and last novelty in the Bill was that there was to be an assessor. Now, he would ask, was it wise at this moment to incur the additional expenses which would necessarily follow the establishment of a Central Board and the appointment of assessors? This could not be done without placing on the land a heavy amount of additional taxation. Those were the grounds why he thought the Bill should not be hastily adopted. They had yet to learn that it was necessary, or that the old Bill had not worked well. If the old valuation of property throughout the country were generally incorrect he should be glad to afford what assistance he could to remedy it; but he firmly believed that it was every day becoming more developed and more accurate. He trusted, therefore, that the Government would not press on the second reading. He had heard that a Motion was to be made that it be referred to a Select Committee; and if it should be he hoped that it would return to the House so amended as to be acceptable to the country, which he did not believe it would be in its present shape.

Colonel Barttelot

MR. NEATE said, that people were very apt, when a Bill affected both the landed interest and houses, to pay more than due attention to that portion which affected the landed interest. He rejoiced, however, that this Bill had been introduced, and by the introduction of Amendments in Committee he should invite the special attention of borough Members to the opportunity now presented to them for reviewing the system of taxation as between houses and land. Houses in towns were taxed half as much more highly than they ought to be when compared with the taxes imposed upon houses in the country, or with what the taxation would be upon a fair and equal taxation. Two important Returns had been moved for upon this subject, one showing what farm-houses in every county in England assessed at £20 really paid; and the other (a continuation of the Return moved for in 1863 by the hon. Member for East Surrey), showing the advance or otherwise of the assessment of land. He also wished to call the attention of the borough Members to the insufficient representation of boroughs in county Boards. Every union in a county was to have two delegates sitting on the county Board, while a borough was to have only one. He should give due notice of an Amendment he intended to move, in order that it might be fully discussed in Committee on the Bill.

MR. HENLEY said, he had hardly imagined that the ingenuity of man could have contrived such a perpetual blister as this Bill must necessarily prove to be. Taxes and rates, as they all knew, were of themselves a great curse and nuisance. It was bad enough to have to pay them, and the being kept in a continual worry, in order that it might be ascertained how much they were to be, made them a ten thousand times greater curse and nuisance than they were before. The House should recollect that all valuations were but approximations to the truth, and if they strove to get to Chinese exactness they would set on foot an amount of worry which was ten thousand times worse to the people to bear, and to the recipients of the tax, than the possible good that could be got by it. What was the proposed machinery to do? There was to be a perfect revision every three years. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) well knew how he had been pressed, with regard to the income tax, not to have the valuations too frequently made on account of the worry and trouble they gave. It was not long since the Secretary to the Treasury broke out very strongly against the officers of the Government as to their conduct in that matter. He (Mr. Henley) differed from his hon. Friend's opinion of those gentlemen, as he believed they had done their duty conscientiously between the Crown and the subject. The Bill before the House set on foot machinery which was to commence operation in the month of May in one year, and was not to finish until the month of June in the next. Then the matters so ascertained were not to be acted upon until the year after—the third year from the time of commencing—and then there were to be supplementary valuations at the end of every year. If all that did not worry people's minds, and set them against taxes and rates, he did not know what people could be made of. There was nothing more impolitic than keeping on a perpetual blister—and this was nothing less—of worry and irritation. It was necessary, they all knew, to pay taxes, but the less people were worried the better. Let them examine the Bill. Boroughs and counties had nothing upon earth in common in what they paid, so far as rates were concerned; and yet the Valuation Board was to be composed of two delegates from every union in a county and one from every borough. He thought the one delegate sent by each borough would not be in a very happy position on such a Board. [Mr. HUNT expressed dissent.] The hon. Gentleman shook his head, but that was one of the provisions in the Bill. There was no reason why the counties and boroughs should be brought together; they had nothing in common, and it was certain that county unions were not good judges of the amount of the deductions that ought to be made in the large towns and boroughs where the property was of a different nature. Then there was a new appellate jurisdiction; but though he had a very great respect for members of the bar, and a still greater respect for them if they were of ten years' standing, he thought that neither their education nor their ten years' standing made them at all conversant of the value of property in counties in which, perhaps, they had never set a foot before. But what was to happen? Any person who appealed was to go before them—the surveyor of taxes having power to appeal as well—and then, unless the contrary was proved, whatever the surveyor of taxes alleged was to be held conclusive. Suppose the surveyor said that A ought to be charged £150 instead of £140, A, in order to disprove that, must necessarily be at the expense of bringing a surveyor or somebody of that character to disprove the assertion of the surveyor of taxes, because, of course, it would be impossible to allow a man to prove his own valuation. The assessor could know nothing of the matter himself; he would have to rely upon the evidence given before him, and in that way a hard and grievous oppression might be brought to bear upon a man. How differently the matter was now treated. The surveyor, thinking that A or B was not properly taxed, made his charge, and the case was heard before four or five different gentlemen of the county who knew something of the value of the property surrounding them. In the Bill before the House it was provided that the assessor could not decide except upon evidence before him, which must be the evidence of surveyors of some kind or other, entailing a grievous expense, and if that evidence were not produced by the words of the Bill, the assessor was to decide according to the absolute dixit of the surveyor. He (Mr. Henley) could not help thinking that that would be a great injustice. In another part of the appellate jurisdiction it was provided that the appellant might claim a survey; but if upon that survey a "substantial" alteration were not made in the valuation, the man who claimed the survey would have to pay for it. But what was the meaning of a "substantial" alteration? Who was to come to an agreement as to what that meant? for it was quite as open as the matter of the valuation itself. All these things made him think the proposed alteration unnecessary. During the last two or three years the country had been going through a complete revaluation, which had not been without expense, the mere fees to the clerks of unions having been very heavy. People now wished for a little quiet. The ink was only just dry upon all the papers which had been written. There had been some few cases of appeal to the sessions, but they had been settled, and people had begun to hope for rest. Here, however, was a new thing, got by taxes out of rates. It was to re-open every question, and keep up the heartburn which would never end. It would take them a year and a half to get the machinery in order, and then at the end of the third year they would have to begin again, being in a perpetual worry all the time. He did not see what advantage was to be gained; in no possible way was it in the interest of the revenue of the Crown that the alteration should be made. It seemed to be proposed from what might be called a spirit of meddling, unless there were something behind of which this Bill was only the forerunner. He did not know what the feeling of the House was upon it; but if he had been here before he should have asked his hon. Friend (Mr. Hunt) not to have brought in the Bill before the quarter sessions had been held in the various counties, in order that they might all have had the opportunity of communicating with their constituents, and have been better informed on the matter than they were now. All the communications that he had had from the country had been adverse to the Bill. The Bill was thought complex, and it was considered that it would be a great worry, trouble, expense, and hardship to have the matter gone into again. He believed the Bill contained unmixed mischief.

LORD HENLEY said, he was not sorry that the Bill had been introduced, as it might improve the position in which valuers now stood. He did not agree with it altogether, but it might be improved in one or two respects, and if it were referred to a Select Committee it might be made a very useful measure. The Valuation Boards appeared to him to have rather insignificant functions and to be somewhat cumbrous. With two members from every union in a county, in addition to the members from the boroughs, the Board might consist of from twenty to forty and even fifty members, which would form a sort of parliament in each county for the valuation of property. He had been very much disappointed in finding what were to be the duties of the Board, as the duties seemed very few, and one of them was objectionable. The first duty was that which affected the rate of reduction for the whole county in which the Board sat. That was a very simple matter, which might easily be adjusted by any committee of magistrates appointed by the quarter sessions. The Board were to organize nothing whatever as to the value of any particular tenement, but merely to take the valuation as laid before them by the different assessment committees. They ought to have more power—power to have the valuation of the whole county made by professional persons, under their own superintendence, which power might be given to them by a new clause introduced into the Bill. The exercise of such a power would be expensive, but the result would be really satisfactory and good. With respect to the Court of Appeal, he did not think a barrister of ten years' standing would be a likely man to possess good judgment in the matter he would be called upon to decide. He would have to decide on evidence on oath. But those deciding should decide on their own knowledge and judgment. He would much sooner see the quarter sessions made the Court of Appeal, for then there would be absolutely no expense—there would be no barrister's salary of £300 or £400 a year to pay. They found one parish where land was let at 30s. an acre, and another where it was let at three guineas, merely because in the latter case it was cut up into small portions. He thought it was therefore essential to have some one resident on the spot to value the land, who would really be able to form a correct judgment upon the matter.

Mr. Henley

MR. CORRANCE said: Having for some years past taken much interest in the question now discussed, I am anxious to make a few remarks, and in so doing must ask the indulgence of the House. Not the less so, that these remarks must be confined to distinct and practical details deriving their interest from the importance of the subject itself. This, I think, it will be admitted to possess—as to very few this question can be a matter of unconcern. We all know what interest a debate on the income tax presents—with what satisfaction a remission of 1d. is received, and not unreasonably, for we all know that this comparatively small sum makes a very large difference to a very considerable class. Now, let us compare this tax with the poor rate. In this we have a tax falling upon some property as upon income—on profits—to an average amount, in agricultural counties, of 2s. 2½d. in the pound; in manufacturing, of 1s. 2½d.; and throughout England, of 1s. 2d.; levied also in a manner confessedly unequal and unjust. I take the admission of the late President of the Poor Law Board as to this. In a recent debate he is reported to have spoken thus—

"In my opinion nothing can be more unfair and capricious than the charge of the poor rate. . . . I do not express that opinion for the first time. I was acting on the original Commission for the Poor Law, and I was struck during that inquiry by seeing the extraordinary unfairness in which this charge for the poor's rate fell in various parts of the country—or on different persons—and the vast number who were totally exempt from such a charge."

In this, therefore, confessedly, we have a tax most serious in amount, and falling with especial severity on property of a certain class, and claiming in such respect the particular attention of this House. It is true that this Bill does not fully open up the whole subject—that it takes cognizance only of a part; and as it is not expedient to raise collateral issues, to that part alone I shall direct my future remarks—namely, the assessment upon property as it now exists. Now, it may be asked, what necessity for revision exists? It is believed that under the Act of 1862 a great step towards the equalization of assessment took place. There is substantial ground for such belief. At the same time, it must be admitted by all who possess a practical knowledge of the operation of this Act that the improvement upon the old plan is but partial and incomplete. It is well known that the basis for valuation is by no means uniform, and that principles, altogether at variance with the terms of the Act, are commonly found to exist; and this, too, more as regards the estimated gross value than the net, concerning which much misapprehension exists. Let me say a word or two as to this. In assessment of land, let upon ordinary terms and tithe, as well as some other hereditaments of that class, no great difficulty exists. For this we have authentic documentary evidence in Income Tax Returns, Tithe Commutation, and the like. But when we assess property of another kind great latitude will be found to exist under the provisions of the Act. In houses let to profitable purposes, in offices, manufactories, and the like, the application of the principle is singularly inexact. The lettable value less depends upon use, situation, and the competition of trade; so also in railways and canals, the total net profit of which is assessed as rent. Nothing can be less satisfactory than the assessment made in such respect. Then, again, under what circumstances were these assessments made in 1862? The Committee were new to their work; and it is not too much to say that two-thirds of the assessments were completed before they thoroughly understood the nature of the task. For total revision it was then too late. The lists also sent in by the parish officers were, in most cases, defective, and they themselves were incapable of the discharge of their task; while on the part of the Committee no absolute power existed to order valuations separately on the union account. This is partially remedied by the new Act; but I think that the Committee might themselves have larger powers in such respect. Now, let me afford the House an illustration of this. At the end of the first year I felt entirely dissatisfied with the work thus done, and in order to see if any common principle could be applied and worked out, I wrote to thirty-four unions to obtain the data upon which these gross values had been worked out. In more than half of these no definite plan appeared to exist, and in the remainder of instances no common agreement upon important points appeared. To reduce practice into precept no pains had been bestowed in any case, except in the rudest form, and to the worst possible common result. Let it be remembered also that these discrepancies chiefly affected the gross, most erroneously supposed to be beyond doubt. The nature of the appeals will show this. For instance, if we assessed land let for accommodation at rack rent at its actual annual value, we were told that to an exorbitant rent were added an excessive rate—a plea often admitted, though by no means sound in such a case—for it was clear that any remission we might make in such respect would, under such circumstances, only add to the possible rent. Again, that houses let to profitable purposes should be rated subject to such a supposed condition was a source of complaint, for it was here assumed that the profits of trade were thus assessed. For this assumption some ground existed, under the want of specified basis, supplied by this Act. But if we refer to previous enactments, no doubt will exist upon this point, for under the statute of William the words—Rebus sic stantibus, convey a clear definition; and as referring to present conditions, are imperative in that sense. By the 55th clause of the present Act all uncertainty is at once removed upon these points, and the actual rental declared to be the minimum of the assessment to a rate. This will much conduce towards uniformity of practice, and is based on a principle equal and just. The composition and construction of the Board proposed under Clause 6 deserve a few remarks. Against it has been urged the introduction of a new power over county finance, and the sanction it would seem to give to the principle of County Financial Boards. Now, against this principle it may, no doubt, with some truth be urged that it vests power in the hands of those who have no permanent interest in the expenditure of the rate; that their interest as ratepayers is only present, and after all not direct; that the landlord is, in fact, the payer of all rates. This, to a certain extent, is the case, and ought to induce some care in the provisions introduced, lest the undue preponderance of the less permanent interest place difficulties in the way of improvements of the more permanent class. In the present instance there would seem little danger of this, either as regards the function discharged, or the proportionate constitution of the Board itself. For myself, moreover, let me candidly confess that I am not opposed to the introduction of this mixed element into county finance, for I believe that under some such provision as this Act contains a very valuable business element may be introduced, tending to a more careful administration, and often a stricter regard for economy than at present exists. One word as to the Court proposed of ultimate Appeal, upon which I must beg leave to express a doubt. Heretofore and up to this time these appeals have been subject to the jurisdiction of another Court, subject to an ultimate appeal to the Queen's Bench. This power it is proposed to remove, the officer appointed being paid out of the county rate in part. From the court of quarter session a most important function is thus removed in a matter especially concerning themselves. There should be good cause for this. To me it is a matter of regret, inasmuch as I do not think that it will fully meet the concurrence of those principally concerned, and will not fail to prejudice many against the Act. I shall not, however, in this stage press my objection to this clause. Finally, let me say, that having given some time and attention to the operation of the former Act, I must think the present measure well calculated to meet most, if not all, its defects. I must express my conviction that this will be the case. One hope, however, let me entertain, that it will not be the last reform applied to this matter of the rates; that Her Majesty's Government having thus bestowed their care upon the assessment to such excellent effect, will also not fail further to consider the incidence and accidents of the rate, and the present claims of the various properties thus assessed. Let there be also equalization in such respect. At present I will say no more, lest such matter be deemed irrelevant to the issue now sought, and thanking the House for their attention, I beg to express my concurrence in the provisions of this Bill, and my intention to afford it my support.

Mr. Corrance

MR. CHILDERS hoped that, whatever difference of opinion there might be as to the machinery, the House would agree that the objects of the Bill were good objects. The first of these objects was to make the assessment of gross estimated rental whether for Queen's taxes, county rates, poor rates, and other parochial rates the same; and the second was to adopt some means to ensure uniformity in the deductions now made from the gross estimated rental for the purpose of arriving at a rateable value for local rates. He therefore hoped the House would allow the Bill to be read a second time, and that the Government would consent to refer the Bill, after the second reading, to a Select Committee; because, however good the objects of the Bill might be, there were matters of detail, and indeed of more than detail, which to his mind were very objectionable, and which no doubt would be thrashed out in an inquiry before the Committee. The Bill proposed to erect a Valuation Board for four or five different purposes; but when one came to look into it, there appeared to be only one real duty of the Board—to render uniform the deductions from the estimated rental. At present they were not uniform. As had already been stated, even neighbouring unions embracing communities identical in character made most unequal deductions per cent, and this, too, upon the same kind of property. That was an anomaly requiring to be remedied. Most of the other duties which it was proposed to impose on the Valuation Board were very small matters, and when the deductions were once settled the Board would have but little to do, and that could be well done by other existing authorities, what he would suggest was that the House should pass those clauses which constituted the Board, and that the Board should only meet once—say next year—to settle what the deduction should be for each county. Having done this, there would be no necessity to retain them in existence, and it might be left in future to the court of quarter sessions, subject, perhaps, to the concurrence of the Poor Law Board, to make any alterations that might be requisite in the rates of deduction. The Board would thus be brought into existence for the only useful function it could perform, and having performed that function, it would be left to the ordinary authorities of the county to make any trivial amendments. This course would dispense with all the clerks, treasurers, and permanent officers who would otherwise have to be appointed, and the Bill so modified would not, he believed, be distasteful to those who would oppose it in its present form. His hon. Friend proposed to erect a new tribunal in the shape of an appellate barrister or assessor, who was to hear the appeals which were now heard, with respect to Queen's taxes, by Local Commissioners, and with respect to local rates by the quarter sessions. He believed, however, these new Courts to be altogether unnecessary. They would involve an additional number of salaried barristers, and whatever his respect for the members of that profession, he was of opinion that a quite sufficient number were already employed in the public service. If a new jurisdiction were required, the appeals might be taken to the County Courts, the Judges of which, as barristers, possessed the needful qualifications, and were not over-burdened with work. He might also add that if the Valuation Board met next year for the purpose of settling a uniform deduction from the gross estimated rental as a criterion of rateable value in each county, there would then be sufficient material to enable the House to arrive at a uniform maximum deduction for the whole country. Holding these views as to the machinery of the Bill being both cumbrous in form and extravagant in duration, while admitting the excellence of its objects, he should offer no opposition to the measure provided his hon. Friend would consent to refer it to a Select Committee.

MR. GOLDNEY said, that if the suggestion of the hon. Member were carried out, all the clauses would be struck out, and nothing left but the preamble, as had been the case with a Bill last year. Instead of going into the details of the measure, they ought rather to look at its principles. No Act was ever carried out more carefully than the Parochial Assessment Act. That measure had for three years worked very satisfactorily, and the doubt which existed as to the power of magistrates to make a county rate having only been set at rest last Session, he believed the deductions would be speedily equalized in every county. In all parts of the country assessment committees were appointed, who applied themselves to their work with the honest intention of organizing a successful basis upon which rating could be placed, and it was hardly just, after they had taken so much trouble, that they should be treated with so little consideration. The system of reductions organized by these committees would be equalized as soon as the county rating came into full operation. He hoped this Bill would not be pressed forward at so early a period of the Session. He thought that part of it relating to the appellate jurisdiction must be abandoned. The Valuation Board, even constituted with the modifications proposed by the hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers), would be bad so far as this matter was concerned. The effect of the constitution of the Board in the manner proposed by the Bill would be that a half or one-third of its members would not attend its meetings, and that the work which was done would not be done by men actually resident in the neighbourhood. In the case of the assessment committees, on the other hand, they had the advantage of the labours of men living on the spot, and knowing every inch of the ground that was to be valued. The Bill was unfair to those who had devoted a large amount of time, trouble, and experience to carry into effect the Act of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Villiers), and its machinery was complex. If the Bill passed, the overseers, the surveyor of taxes, the assessment committee, and the Valuation Board would all have to be called into operation before a deduction could be determined, and this was surely an exceedingly complex arrangement. Until some practical grievance was brought before the House to show that the former measure had not worked well, the present Bill ought not to be proceeded with.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, this was a most invaluable Bill, and he hoped there would be no delay in passing it, although it might, perhaps, be necessary, in order to settle its details, to refer it to a Select Committee. If the valuation of the county by the committee of the ratepayers and the magistrates were struck out, one of the best provisions of the Bill would be destroyed. For the last sixteen years such an improvement in the existing law had been advocated by different Members of that House, especially by Mr. Joseph Hume, and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Milner Gibson). He regretted, when such a Bill as this was introduced by the Government, that hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House should oppose it. If the Bill were passed, the duties imposed by it upon the committee of ratepayers and magistrates would become the nucleus of more important duties relating to highways and other county business, as those committees would be more competent to deal with financial affairs than were magistrates in county sessions, who sat as an irresponsible body to tax the ratepayers of the county. There was every reason to believe that a committee thus constituted would become important, uniting in itself the functions of Boards of Guardians and of the financial Boards of the counties; and that to such a committee taxing powers might be intrusted, which at present was impossible. The House could well deal even with the details of the Bill, without referring it to a Select Committee. It appeared objectionable to appoint any new officers, there being now county officers, whose time and position qualified them to fulfil the duties of assessor. It was a well drawn Bill, reflecting great credit on the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt) who had been fortunate enough to propose it to the House. It did not supersede the Act of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Villiers). The principle of deductions should be settled by the Act of Parliament, since it might become the principle upon which the franchise was to be based. There would be no difficulty in dividing property into various classes, and in fixing the proportion between rating and gross estimated rental throughout the kingdom.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, that while he did not fully concur in every provision of the Bill, he tendered his best thanks to the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt) who had introduced it. A strong case had been made out for some amendments being made in the Union Assessment Act, and in the main the present Bill proposed to amend it in an acceptable manner. In one instance that occurred in his county a union had absolutely refused to rate itself at its proper value, and the Commissioners had been obliged to make the proper valuation, which had caused a considerable amount of ill-feeling. The Bill would lead to the assimilation of the basis of Imperial and local taxation. It would be a great benefit to the ratepayer if all his rates were based upon one uniform valuation. He did not think that the appointment of the assessor would be likely to lead to the expense that had been supposed; because, although the magistrates at quarter sessions acted gratuitously, the expenses of bringing up witnesses were very large. These expenses would be saved by the assessor holding his court at convenient places. The assessor would be paid according to the amount of work he performed, and not by yearly income; consequently, if there were no appeals, no expenses would be incurred. Upon the whole, he thought the Bill a good one, and he should give it his best support. He only wished that the Bill had gone further, and had provided one uniform scheme of deduction. The Return moved for by the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) showed that deductions were so various as to render it difficult if not impossible to carry out such a scheme; but he might say that a somewhat similar proposal had been tried successfully in Gloucestershire. He should be glad to see the duties of overseer performed by some paid officer instead of by the existing machinery. He cordially supported the Bill, and hoped that it would not be referred to a Select Committee, as he thought that its details might be settled in Committee of the whole House.

Mr. Henry Seymour

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he could not join in the wish expressed by the hon. Member that this Bill should not be referred to a Select Committee, seeing that great objections had been expressed either to its principles or details by hon. Members on both sides of the House. The Bill had certainly come before the House in a hasty manner. The hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Henry Seymour) who approved it, did so for a purpose totally opposite to that of its promoters. That hon. Member was anxious to control the expenditure in counties, and he seemed to see a prospect of this Board being summoned for one purpose and ultimately used for another. He (Mr. Seymour) thought that this Board would act as a Board for controlling the county expenditure. The House need not, however, think of any ulterior purpose when they had one already before them. It was urged in favour of the Bill that it would secure the action of the ratepayers with the magistrates; but anybody who knew the habits of ratepayers generally would know that they would decline to attend unless their expenses were provided for, so that the justices would have complete control in the regulation of the assessments. The great object of the late Act was to ascertain the real value of the property which was to be rated, and that object had been attained. It might have been supposed that these unions would not agree precisely as to the amount of deduction that was to be made in order to get at the rateable value. It was, however, something to have done so much towards ascertaining the real value of the property that was to be rated as was accomplished by the Union Assessment Act. Nothing could be more astonishing—considering how much alive the public were to the subject of the taxation of property—than that people should have allowed so large a revenue to be collected in so slovenly and uncertain a manner. The result of the new assessment operation had been to bring £15,000,000 annually to charge which had escaped before. Valuation had been left to ignorant and irresponsible persons, and the consequence was that property remained either not valued at all or not re-valued for years and years together. The property of persons of influence in many cases remained rated much too low. There were instances of property which had been raised in value 400 per cent, and there were parishes which had never been re-assessed during the present century. Some persons had questioned whether that Act had worked well, and he supposed that the object of the present Bill was to make it work better. He had, however, not yet heard the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) state in what respect that Act had not worked well. He would not say it might not be improved; but he did not think the time had come when it could be said that the Act had not worked well, or that it was necessary to have so elaborate—he would not say so cumbrous—a measure to improve it. The Act had, at all events, given general satisfaction. Complaint had been made as to the absurd way in which the assessment committees, in some particular cases, had acted. Every facility, however, was given for re-hearing and appeals when the assessment was published, and every parish throughout the union was interested in questioning the assessment of the other parishes, and even the assessment of individual ratepayers in those parishes. The assessment committee could easily be called together to re-hear any particular case. He presumed that there was no obstacle to an appeal to quarter sessions, but those appeals had been extremely few. Hon. Members said that there were people who felt themselves wronged; but there had been no disposition to appeal, and if there had been, it was not always necessary to go before the quarter sessions, since there were special sessions four times a year where cases could be heard. He might be reminded, on the other hand, of the Return procured by the hon. Member for Buckingham; showing a considerable variation in the estimate which the committees made of the deductions necessary to be allowed to get at the rateable value. He did not know how these variations could occur, because the business was so very simple. The principle of deductions was to keep the property in that state of repair which gave the ordinary value. They got the ordinary value and then made the deductions for repairs and insurance. That was not a very difficult thing, and if parishes employed a professional man, or published what they did, there ought not to be any very great variation in the assessment. The 10th clause of the present Bill professed to discover some maximum or fixed rule of deduction. He did not see why, if that were possible, it should not be the subject of a simple enactment for the purpose. If it were not possible he did not know how by a conjunction of magistrates and ratepayers—but he thought practically there would be magistrates only—it would be possible to discover it. It would always happen, sometimes from error, and sometimes from corruption, that these differences would occur. A fixed rule would often be arbitrary and unjust. The decay of one class of houses would be more rapid than of another, and it might be proper to put 20 or 25 per cent on one class and 15 per cent on another. It would thus be unjust to fix a maximum, and always make this deduction for houses and that deduction for land. The real purpose of the Bill was to discover that rule or maximum; but it did not require a great apparatus of barristers and others to discover whether that rule had been observed. He supposed there would be fifty-two barristers, one for each county. [Mr. HUNT: The assessment would be paid for by the piece.] That would not shorten the work. The purpose of the Bill was a very good one; but seeing how much danger there might be in passing it in its present shape, and how little ground had been laid for complaint against the present Act, he trusted that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt) would not scruple to refer the Bill to a Committee upstairs.

MR. HUNT said, that the Government had shown their appreciation of the value of the machinery of the Assessment Bill, inasmuch as they had made use of it not only for the purpose of local taxation but also for purposes of Imperial taxation. His right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), whom every one in that House was, he felt assured, glad to see again in his place, had spoken of the Bill as complex, and as calculated to inflict a great deal of worry and vexation on the unfortunate ratepayers throughout the country. His right hon. Friend must, however, bear in mind that it was a measure in which it was proposed to combine three different systems of valuation in one, and that it must, therefore, necessarily consist of a considerable number of clauses. On looking through those clauses he would, at the same time, find that they formed as a whole a Bill of a much more simple character than their number would lead a person to imagine. In answer to the other objection advanced against it he must contend that, so far from tending to create worry, it would in a great measure remedy the vexation which now existed. It would sweep away a cumbrous and expensive machinery, and substitute for it something less complex and more effective. Let him, for instance, take the valuation list for the purposes of the Poor Law under the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. From that list it would be found that there were two appeals—one to the local assessment committee, another by the overseers to the quarter sessions. Then as to the assessment for the poor rate there might be an appeal to the special sessions, then to the quarter sessions, and from that a case might be submitted to the Queen's Bench. Where there was no Highway Board, too, an appeal lay to the special sessions, from that to the quarter sessions, and thence to the Superior Court. In the case of church rates there was an appeal to the Ecclesiastical Court, while in that of the county rate there was an appeal in the first instance to the committee of justices appointed to fix the basis of the rate, and next to the justices at quarter sessions. With regard to the income tax, and the inhabited house duty, appeals under Schedule A and B must be made to the local Commissioners, a separate appeal being necessary in each case. It was, in fact, under the existing system possible to have upwards of twelve different appeals as to the value of the same property, and in those five cases the ultimate decisions might be at variance with each other—county rates, poor rate, highway rate, church rate, the assessment of the income tax under Schedules A and B, and the inhabited house duty. If in all these instances one assessment and one appeal were substituted for the present cumbrous machinery, how, he should like to know from his right hon. Friend, could the measure in which such a proposal was embodied fairly be characterized as one calculated to increase worry and vexation? It was intended to provide under the Bill that every overseer should make out a valuation list and send it to an assessment committee, and that that committee should deal with it as now. The Court of Appeal would not be as at present the quarter sessions, but would be altered. Much had been said as to the appointment of a Surveyor of Taxes; but he saw no reason why such an officer should not appear before an assessment committee as much as before district Commissioners. It was quite true that a Surveyor of Taxes would be a new apparition in the Boardroom of Guardians; but he would discharge there a very useful function, because, under the operation of the valuable measure of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. C. P. Villiers)—as was abundantly apparent from numbers of letters he had received—there was a want of some person directly interested in putting up everybody's assessment to the proper amount—a want which the Surveyor of Taxes would supply. The introduction of such an officer before the assessment committee would, in his opinion, tend to secure a just assessment, not only to the property tax, but also to local taxation. The next question which arose was whether anything was required to regulate the scale of deductions to be made in reducing the rateable value from the gross value. The right hon. Gentleman said he had heard no evidence that satisfied him that fault was found with the mode in which those deductions were made at present. He, however, had seen plenty of evidence on the subject. From the Returns which had been moved for by his hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham he had extracted a few of the more glaring cases furnished on the point, and when he mentioned them to the House he was sure it would be admitted that they did not bear out the view which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to entertain. In the county of Bedford, for instance, he found that there were the following variations in the percentages of deductions:—Land, 5 per cent the highest scale, 1 per cent the lowest; houses under £8, highest scale 30 per cent, lowest 10 per cent; houses at and above £15, highest scale 20, lowest 10. The county of Bedford was, however, not singular in regard to the variation in the scale of those deductions. In Gloucester he found the scale to be as follows:—Land, highest 10, lowest 5 per cent; land with buildings, highest 20, lowest 10; houses under £8, maximum 25, minimum 10 per cent; houses at and above £15, maximum 20, minimum 10. Again, in Lancashire, in the case of houses under £8, the maximum was 33, the minimum 15 per cent; houses at and above £15, maximum 33, minimum 10. He might go through many other counties to show his right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) that improvement was required with regard to the scale of deductions. In his right hon. Friend's own county, which he fully expected would be a model in that respect, he found that the deductions ranged from 10 to 1 per cent in the case of land in some unions, while in the case of houses under £8 the variation was from 35 to 10. Under such circumstances, he thought it was desirable that some greater degree of uniformity in the matter of deduction should, if possible, be established. To lay down in an Act of Parliament a uniform scale would, no doubt, be a very simple mode of meeting the difficulty; but to such a proposal he did not think the House would assent. The Government had therefore adopted what he conceived to be the best plan to secure uniformity ultimately by taking certain distinct areas. Some comments had been made with regard to the Valuation Board; but that was the very body which, in a great many counties, started into life when the Union

Mr. C. P. Villiers

Assessments Act came into force. The delegates from counties met to pass resolutions, and to fix a scale of deductions; but when they sent them down to the different unions, nearly every one of those unions refused to abide by the decision thus arrived at. It was therefore felt that they should be by legislation obliged to act upon the scale to which the delegates might agree. The present Bill attempted to attain that object. His hon. Friend the Member for Pontefract (Mr. Childers) seemed to be of opinion that the Valuation Board would be a large machinery created for a very small purpose. It would, no doubt, be open to that criticism in as far as it would consist of a great number of members; but it was absolutely necessary that such should be the case, because it ought to represent all parts of the county, otherwise there would not be so ready an acquiescence in its decisions. He did not, however, think that it would be an expensive Board. He did not propose that the members should be paid; nor did he believe their meetings need be very frequent. There would, however, be a treasurer and a clerk, but of those it would be found in reality necessary to pay only one. The pay of the clerk would be small; and the whole expense of the Valuation Board would be so trifling as to be hardly worth taking into account, considering that they would get rid of a great deal of costly machinery and costly appeals. It was said that the Board might meet once, and then be swept away; but if a Board laid down a scale of deductions, there must be somebody to see that it was properly carried out; and who so fit for that purpose as the Board which laid down that scale of deductions? The process would be this. The Board would employ their clerk or an accountant to go through the list and see that their instructions had been carried out. They would then have a meeting, at which they would go pro forma through the list, with the remarks of the clerk attached, and then affix their seal, whereby the valuation list would come into force. With regard to the Appellate Court, it must be remembered that at present there were different courts of appeal for different subjects. There were the District Commissioners with regard to Schedules A and B, and the county magistrates in quarter sessions as to the Union Assessment Committee, and some other local matters. It was no doubt difficult to find out what was a good Court of Appeal; but he had no hesitation in saying that the court of quarter sessions was not a good Court of Appeal for that purpose. He believed that most courts of quarter sessions would be exceedingly glad to be relieved of that jurisdiction. A court of quarter sessions was a fluctuating body, and if the appeal was a long one it would not be heard throughout by the same persons. An appeal to quarter sessions was also expensive. The witnesses had to be brought up to the county town; the parties had to appear by attorneys and counsel, whose fees had to be paid; and there were also hotel expenses to be incurred. In fact, they had a most cumbrous and costly mode of appeal, and when all was done they had not a very satisfactory court. His right hon. Friend the Member for Oxfordshire said they, at all events, had some persons there who knew something about the matter; but, for his own part, he was not sure that was an advantage. [Mr. HENLEY: I spoke of the Commissioners.] Then, he had misunderstood his right hon. Friend; but there was this to be said about courts of quarter sessions—though that they might know more about the matter than the barrister who might be sent down, yet magistrates were but human beings, and they might sometimes know too much. When cases affecting property in which they were interested came before them, it was not impossible they might have a bias. He believed that courts of quarter sessions endeavoured to do their duty as fairly and as conscientiously as could be done; but when cases of that kind came before them, even where they had not a bias, they might be suspected of having one. The Bill proposed to substitute a barrister of ten years' standing for the court of quarter sessions; by that means, though he might have no personal knowledge on the subject, if they obtained a man of judicial mind to deal with these questions, they might expect to have more satisfactory decisions. As to the expense connected with having these assessors, it was not intended that they should be regular salaried officers, but that they should be remunerated for their services from time to time as those services might be required. If the Bill passed, they did not expect to have many appeals. They believed that the decision of the assessment committee would be accepted as final in almost every instance; but still, they must have some Court of Appeal, and the chairman of the Valuation Board would have the power of selecting a competent man with the consent of the Treasury. He did not say that that Appellate Court was the best that might be devised. It had been suggested that a County Court Judge should try these appeals; but a County Court Judge was only a barrister appointed in a different way, and he generally had some interest in property in some part of the county. Moreover, if he had these extra duties thrown upon him, they must give him some addition to his salary, which would involve considerable expense. However, the question as to the appointment of the court of appeal was not one of principle, but of detail. Indeed, many of the questions raised that evening were questions of detail. In the case of a Bill of that sort it was impossible that everything could be considered before it was introduced; and the Government were much indebted to many hon. Gentlemen for the suggestions they had made. He agreed with the recommendation which had come from the front Bench opposite, that it would be proper to refer the Bill to a Select Committee; and he hoped that those hon. Members who took an interest in that subject would be kind enough to serve on the Committee, from whose labours, he trusted a sound and valuable measure would emanate. If the second reading were assented to, he would take an early opportunity of nominating the Select Committee.

Mr. Hunt

COLONEL GILPIN said, he wished to state what had taken place in the county of Bedford on this matter. Before it was attempted to carry into effect the Act passed by the late Government, a Committee was appointed composed of gentlemen from each union in the county, in order, as far as they could, to arrange what should be the basis of deductions. Upon the basis so arranged they had acted as closely as they could; but if a Bill with the cumbrous machinery of the present one were passed, they could never get at the absolute value, but only at the approximate value, in a parish. What they complained of was, that having acted upon the existing Act, of which they had yet had but little experience, and having arranged their unions, and there being few appeals, a measure like this was now brought in to upset all that they had done and put them to increased expense. The proposal to appoint barristers did not appear acceptable to the House. It did not seem to him to be necessary to call in the Surveyor of Taxes to make the local committees honest. He knew the case of a landlord in his own county, who let his estates below their value, and when the tenants were warned by the Surveyor of Taxes that the land was underlet, rather than have a re-valuation made they paid the difference. The officers of the revenue department, he thought, interfered too much already in the counties. He was glad that the Bill was to be referred to a Select Committee, though he had the greatest doubts whether it could be converted into an acceptable measure.

MR. READ said, with reference to a remark that had been made as to nobody who was not a justice being likely to attend at a Valuation Board, that the cattle plague committees of different counties were chiefly composed of the justices and the principal ratepayers, and he believed that the ratepayers were just as attentive and assiduous in discharging their duties as the justices. A great deal had been said in that debate about the variety in the deductions made from the gross estimated rental in getting at the rateable value; but nothing had been said about the way in which the gross estimated rental was at present ascertained. He believed that that was just as irregular as the other. If any one asked him which was the better criterion of value, he would not hesitate to say, notwithstanding all the variety exhibited in the deductions quoted by the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Hunt), that rating was much better than rental.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

And, on Wednesday, March 18, Select Committee nominated, as follows:—MR. HUNT, MR. GATHORNE HARDY, MR. VILLIERS, MR. CHILDERS, MR. POULETT SCROPE, Colonel BARTHELOT, Sir MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH, MR. WENTWORTH BEAUMONT, MR. HUBBARD, MR. GOLDNEY, MR. PORTMAN, MR. NEATE, MR. LEEHAN, MR. READ, MR. CORRANCE, MR. GRAVES, Colonel DYOTT, MR. WILBRAHAM EGERTON, MR. HIBBERT, MR. DUNLOP, and MR. DENT:—Five to be the quorum.

METROPOLITAN POOR (re-committed) BILL.

(Mr. Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Earle.)

[BILL 66.] COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 31 (Charges for Maintenance.)

EARL GROSVENOR proposed an Amendment for the purpose of requiring that the expense of the additional buildings to be erected under the Bill should be ultimately defrayed out of the common fund.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the Amendment could be more appropriately discussed when later clauses having some relation to the question of the expense of the new buildings came before the Committee.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 32 to 37, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 38 (Building for Dispensary.)

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he wished to ask, what was the meaning of the term, "Poor Law Board," and also of the term, "by order?"

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the President of the Poor Law Board was joined in the Commission with others, who signed the general orders affecting parishes and unions. Three of them, at least, had to sign. Orders were in two forms, common orders being signed by the President and countersigned by the Secretary; whilst, as he had said, there were some which must be signed by three of the Commissioners. He, as President of the Poor Law Board, was responsible for everything done.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 39 agreed to.

Clause 40 (Election of Committee.)

EARL GROSVENOR proposed an Amendment with reference to the nomination of a portion of the Boards of Guardians.

After discussion, Earl GROSVENOR said he would withdraw the Amendment, on the understanding that the question raised by it should be dealt with on the bringing up of the Report.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 41 (Number, Qualifications, &c., of Committee.)

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he moved the omission of the word "Qualifications." He objected to the Poor Law Board, or, in other words, one individual, having the power to decide on the qualification of a guardian.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he thought it was immaterial whether the words were retained or omitted, because the qualifications of guardians had been to a certain extent defined by a preceding clause.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he did not see why the hon. Member should object to what would require a guardian to be properly qualified.

MR. AYRTON said, as a definition had already been given of the word "Qualifications," it was unnecessary in this clause.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 42 agreed to.

Clause 43 (Appointment of Dispensers, &c.)

MR. VANDERBYL:—I have already expressed my approval of this Bill; but while I admire the sagacity with which the numerous conflicting interests have been adjusted, I cannot allow what I consider a serious omission to pass unnoticed. In Clause 43, now before us, it is stated that the dispensary committee shall appoint "proper persons" to be the dispensers of medicine, &c. Now, it seems to me that a non-professional committee is scarcely competent to decide upon the qualifications of a dispenser. An applicant for the appointment might be a very proper person in their eyes, and still be greatly deficient in his knowledge of pharmacy. Not long ago the managers of the Bedford Infirmary appointed as a "proper person" to fill the office of dispenser a lad sixteen years of age, son of one of the nurses. This boy nearly poisoned several patients, and made so many blunders that the appointment had to be cancelled. This case is fully reported in The Bedford Times of 22nd January last, but I will not trouble the House with the details. I am happy to say that in the majority of our metropolitan hospitals such an appointment could not have been made, as all our best hospitals now require their dispensers to be duly certified as competent under the provisions of the Pharmacy Act of 1852. The army medical department also requires that its dispensers shall be duly qualified by certificate; and I can see no reason why the sick poor should not be protected in a similar way. I notice that the hon. Member for Bedfordshire (Mr. H. Russell) has an Amendment on the paper similar to mine, but in different words. I am unwilling, however, to restrict the choice of the managers, and I would therefore move that the words "proper persons" be omitted, and the following words inserted in their place:—

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

"Persons on the medical register, or duly certified as competent under the provisions of the Pharmacy Act of 1852, or the Apothecaries Act of 1815."

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he was as fully impressed as was the hon. Member with the importance of appointing only properly qualified men to the office of dispensers. Instead of the hon. Member's Amendment, however, he thought it would be better by inserting the word "Qualifications" a little lower down in the clause, to bring that subject under the cognizance and supervision of the Poor Law Board.

MR. BRADY said, he should support the proposal made by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board.

MR. GILPIN said, he thought that the object which the hon. Member for Bridgwater sought to attain would be secured by the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. THOMAS CAVE said, he should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Bridgwater, because he thought that such an opportunity of giving the pharmaceutical chymists of England that status to which from their education they were entitled, and which they found no difficulty in obtaining on the Continent, ought not to be lost.

SIR JOHN SIMEON said, that their object was not to establish the status of any particular class, but merely to provide a good safeguard, and that he believed would be attained by the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board.

MR. VANDERBYL could not see why the suffering poor should be treated with less consideration than soldiers; a qualification similar to that which he proposed being insisted upon in dispensers of army hospitals.

MR. BRADY said, he was authorized by the gentlemen who were chiefly concerned in the question to state that they were satisfied with the proposal of the Government.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, the Committee wanted to satisfy, not the chemists, but the poor.

Amendment negatived.

On Motion of Mr. GATHORNE HARDY, the word "Qualifications" inserted.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 44 (Provision and Dispensing of Medicines, &c.)

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he moved the omission of the words "in receipt of relief," the effect of which would be that medicine and medical assistance might be claimed by the poor indiscriminately if they required them.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he hoped the clause would be rendered more clear. Undoubtedly parties should receive medical relief from the parish doctors or dispensaries without being in the receipt of other relief from the parish.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the clause merely provided that those coming to the dispensaries as paupers were to have medicines dispensed to them on prescription.

MR. NEATE said, that there were persons who only required medical relief.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that if they received medical aid they would be paupers.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he hoped the Committee would not do its charity by halves.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, there were plenty of dispensaries where medical assistance could be obtained without rendering the recipients paupers.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he would suggest that the words "such of the poor as require relief" should be substituted for "in receipt of relief."

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, that what the persons would receive was medical relief, and when they received medical relief they were paupers to all intents and purposes.

LORD EDWARD HOWARD said, that they should agree to give medical relief to persons who were not in a position to pay for medical advice, without making them paupers or causing their homes to be broken up to go into the house. The consequences arising from the illness of the head of a family might be cut short in the beginning by receiving medical relief, and the parish money might thus be saved by rendering it unnecessary to receive, not only the father, but the rest of the family into the house.

MR. BRADY said, they should give medical relief in the most unexceptionable manner they possibly could. He should support the Amendment by analogy to the Medical Charities Act of Ireland.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the case of Ireland was altogether different from that of England, inasmuch as an Irish medical man would not undertake the care of any patient with a first fee of less than a guinea. He would endeavour to meet the views of the hon. Gentlemen opposite by substituting the words "entitled to relief" for "receipt of relief."

MR. NEATE said, he had thought of proposing that alteration, but on further consideration he was afraid it would increase the difficulty.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY moved the insertion of the words "entitled to," instead of "in receipt of."

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 45 (Appointment of District Medical Officers.)

MR. J. STUART MILL said, he had ventured on a former clause to make some suggestions which had been received very courteously, and he was now going to make two other suggestions, which were not new, but had been frequently made by, perhaps, the highest authority on the subject, Mr. Chadwick, the only surviving member of the Royal Commission which drew up the Poor Law. That Commission was one of the most enlightened and able that ever sat, and so long ago as 1834 proposed principles on the subject of education, which, Parliament being afraid of doing too many good deeds at once, left for adoption by generations to come. He regretted Mr. Chadwick was not himself a Member of that House; there was scarcely any one whose services would be more valuable on many points of administrative improvement. The first suggestion he had to offer was this—if they wished the poor to be effectually taken care of, the medical officers appointed should not be in private practice. It was not to be expected in the ordinary run of human affairs that public duty would not be neglected for private practice. It was eminently honourable to the profession that public duties were so well attended to as they were; but medical officers should be under no temptation to postpone their public duties to private practice. Could any one suppose that in a time of epidemic and disorder, when their services would be most required by the poor, that they would not be under the temptation of postponing their public duties for their private practice? One had heard of people advertising for perfection in a schoolmaster for £40 a year, which they were just as likely to get as a Board of Guardians were likely to get a competent medical officer for £100 a year. The other point was as to the mode of the appointment of the medical officers. He thought we might well adopt the practice of the hospitals of Paris, which were the best managed in Europe, where the medical officers were appointed by a medical board after examination; and he would suggest whether it would not be in the power of the College of Physicians and the College of Surgeons, in combination with the Civil Service Commissioners, to have a system of competitive examinations in order to test the capacity of those medical officers who were appointed. It was clear that the House was not at present prepared to adopt this suggestion; but he laid it before the House and the right hon. Gentleman, in the hope that it might be taken into consideration on some future occasion. He did not move any Amendment on the subject.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he did not think that in the country it would be possible to get men to take the duty if they were prohibited from having a private practice as well. In the metropolis they had been obliged to give up all private practice in certain cases, where sufficient employment was given to them in connection with the Poor Law. Some instances had come under his notice where medical men having very urgent cases in connection with the Poor Law Board had not given them that preference which they ought to have done, considering that they were receiving a regular salary for their services to the poor. At the same time, he was bound to remark that in these cases the salaries were so small that the medical officers could not be much blamed for endeavouring to get money from other sources. The second suggestion of the hon. Member was one which opened up a large question, and which, therefore, he could not discuss on this Bill. He had had no experience of competitive examination of medical men, and did not believe it had ever been tried in this country. He could not say that he should be prepared to give his adhesion to such a system. It would lessen the responsibility of those appointing these officers. Under the existing system, if complaints were made to the Poor Law Board, they were always attended to, and rigorous measures were taken in cases where these had been neglected. In his opinion the present checks were sufficient.

MR. BRADY said, he was surprised that the hon. Member for Westminster, who was so well informed on subjects in general, should venture to speak on this subject, on which he had no information whatever. The hon. Member ought to visit Westminster Hospital, Guy's, and St. Bartholomew's, where he would find the most eminent men in the profession attending without receiving one penny of salary. If they were to adopt the hon. Member's suggestion and not allow private practice they would only get young men fresh from the schools to accept the appointment of medical officers, men who had no experience whatever, and who would as soon as they had obtained the requisite experience throw up their situations and resort to private practice. As to competitive examination, the hon. Member did not seem to be aware that all physicians, and, still more, all surgeons, passed through an examination as severe as that of any other in the kingdom.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, that as the suggestion which he ventured to make was an administrative, not a medical, suggestion, he did not see why he should be prevented from making it, though he was not a medical man. As to the question of remuneration, he had said before what he now repeated, that if his suggestions were agreed to, the remuneration to medical officers must be considerably raised. Whatever money was spent in this direction was most usefully employed, because they ought to have the best medical assistance that could be obtained for the poor.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 46 to 48, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 49 (Addition of nominated members to District Board.)

SIR T. F. BUXTON said, he wished to move the omission of certain words in this clause which authorized the Poor Law Board to nominate to be members of the district Board such persons as they might think fit—

“From among Justices of the Peace for any county or place resident in the district of the school, or from among ratepayers resident in that district, and assessed to the poor rate therein on an annual rateable value of not less than forty pounds, or partly from one and partly from the other.”

Their duties would be of no easy kind, as they would have to visit the workhouses,

Mr. J. Stuart Mill

and to visit the schools, which were often, and ought to be always, out of London. Now, the nominated guardians were to be either justices of the peace or £40 ratepayers. As to the first of these, he remarked that justices of the peace were very rare in the North and East of London, and it might as well be recommended to nominate the Lord Chancellor. As to the £40 ratepayers, no doubt they could be had; but they could only give their services in the evening, being busily engaged in their various occupations through the day. The care of the schools would, therefore, devolve upon the clergy, who were already overworked. He objected to the choice of the Poor Law Board being thus restricted to classes of persons who did not reside in the poorer quarters of London, and thought it would be preferable for the Poor Law Board to exercise their own discretion in selecting persons to be members of the district Boards. He therefore proposed that the clause should be amended by striking out the qualification required for members of the district Boards.

MR. HIBBERT said, he objected altogether to the principle of the clause, which placed too much power in the hands of the President of the Poor Law Board. He objected to the principle of nominated members altogether, but he thought they ought either to adhere to the elective or nominative principle, and not attempt to mix up the two.

MR. AYRTON said, that the clause was drawn up in accordance with the principle that had regulated the Poor Law ever since the time of Queen Elizabeth. He hoped that the clause would be agreed to as it stood originally.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that a large number of the principal metropolitan schools were removed from London to the country, and he objected to the nominated members of the Boards of management being taken entirely from the districts in which the schools were situated. They had abandoned a great constitutional principle by giving up even one-third of the members to be nominated by the Government. He would support the clause, because he did not like the nominative system, and these qualifications imposed at least some restrictions on the powers of the Poor Law Board.

Amendment negatived.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 50 to 54, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 55 (Basis of Contributions.)

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, that the rateable value of the metropolis was £14,700,000. This was spread over thirty-nine unions and parishes; of which fifteen unions had been re-assessed under the Union Assessment Act, leaving twenty-four of the wealthiest parishes which had not been so re-assessed. The latter included Kensington, Paddington, Chelsea, St. George's, Hanover Square, St. Margaret's, and St. John's, Westminster, St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, and St. James, Westminster. If those parishes were fairly re-assessed the estimated total rental of them would be much greater than the sum at which it now stood. The time of their original assessment went back almost beyond the memory of man. Hence they escaped their due share of the public burdens. The same was the case with the nine great parishes and unions of the West of London, with a rental of £3,500,000, of which only one—that of Fulham—had been re-assessed. He thought the Bill should contain a clause providing that every parish which had not been re-assessed under the new Assessment Act should be forthwith re-assessed. It was only due to the poorer districts, and those which had fairly carried out the Assessment Act, to place the rating on a uniform basis. Every one must have expected that such a union as that of Poplar would have got some pecuniary advantage by this Bill; but the fact was that Poplar would have to pay £2,332 in addition to its present amount. He could only account for this by the fact that the union was one of those which had been re-assessed. The City of London did not object to paying its full share towards the maintenance of the poor of the metropolis; but his constituents did think that, with a view to equal justice for all, every union and parish should be re-assessed on the same plan.

MR. AYRTON said, that several parishes in the metropolis were rated higher for county purposes than they were for parochial. St. George's, Hanover Square, was rated to the amount of £200,000 more for the former than for the latter. The clause provided that the sums to be paid by unions and parishes under this Act should be constituted on the rateable value according to the valuation lists, or where there were none—

"According to the latest poor rate for the time being for the union or parish, or otherwise as the Poor Law Board from time to time direct."

If those latter words were sufficient to enable the Poor Law Board to adopt the valuation for the county rate when it was the higher one, he had no objection to make; but if not he thought words should be inserted to provide that the higher of the two valuations should be the one adopted.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that this was the meaning of the words in question.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he objected to those words, because he considered that they conferred upon the Poor Law Board an almost autocratic power, far beyond what could be advantageously intrusted to them. In approaching the words "equality of assessment," it was unjust that in some parishes there should be such diversity as from 50 to 75 per cent, and at rack-rent. He should move in the place of the words "or on such other basis as the Poor Law Board may from time to time direct," to insert words to the effect that the assessment should be made "upon the estimate or basis on which the county rate is assessed."

MR. GOSCHEN said, he wished to ask what construction was intended to be conveyed by the phrase "or on such other basis as the Poor Law Board may from time to time direct?"

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the words in question were introduced by him into the clause for the very purpose of meeting the difficulty which had been pointed out by hon. Gentlemen. It was, beyond all question, unfair that in some parts of the metropolis the assessment should be made upon the poor rate, in others upon the county rate; in some cases on a recent, in others upon a very ancient, assessment. The phrase was expressly intended to remedy the inequality in the assessments, by giving the Board jurisdiction as arbitrator between different unions. It would not be fair that the City of London and other unions which had gone to the expense and trouble of new assessments should be more heavily taxed than parishes where nothing had been done in the matter for many years. He wished to give the Poor Law Board the power of determining the best assessment for particular parishes and unions. He was happy to hear that the City of London was willing to bear further burdens, and thought this showed a very proper spirit, especially as the City had recently claimed 700,000 persons who did not sleep, though many of them doubtless were employed, within its limits. He proposed by these words to give the Poor Law Board power to deal with these inequalities in the same manner as they were dealt with in the case of the police rate. The House would remember that when he introduced the Bill he intimated his intention—which he hoped to carry out at no great distance of time—to bring in a Bill for the uniform rating of the whole metropolis, so that the present provision was, to a certain extent, one of a temporary character.

Mr. Ayrton

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, that the parishes had secured the exemptions which had been referred to, because they had united at the time of the Act and threatened to combine against and have it rejected if their exemptions were not respected. They could not, however, maintain those exemptions (conferring the power of fixing the basis for assessment) except under their Local Acts, and unless he was mistaken one of the provisions of this Bill was to do away with those Local Acts, which would make them at once subject to the Union Assessment Act.

MR. LOCKE said, he objected to the words in the clause referring to the Poor Law Board, and suggested the insertion of other words, which would enable them to fix the assessment on the basis either of the poor rate or of the county rate. He suggested that the word "otherwise" should be left out, and the words "or on such other basis as the Poor Law Board may direct," introduced.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he would have no objection to that.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he would suggest the introduction of a clause compelling a re-assessment in the parishes where it had not yet been made.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. C. P. Villiers), that when the Local Acts of the parishes were got rid of they could be dealt with; but he did not think that it would be advisable to introduce a clause in the present Bill compelling re-assessment in those parishes.

MR. GILPIN said, he thought the suggestion of the hon. and learned Member for Southwark (Mr. Locke) would get rid of the difficulty.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS said, he objected to the discretion proposed to the Poor Law Board.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he thought the county rating was less to be relied on than any other.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 56 to 58, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 59 (Determination or Variation of Contracts with Workhouse Medical Officers.)

MR. NEATE said, he wished to ask what was to be the basis of compensation in cases where, for instance, the Board might appoint a resident medical officer in place of an outdoor medical attendant?

MR. J. STUART MILL said, the clause, as he understood it, would empower the Poor Law Board to dismiss the officers of any Poor Law district, on grant of compensation at their discretion, though those gentlemen had hitherto held office for life, except in case of misconduct. Whatever the confidence which those officers felt in the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy), they did not like to be in the power absolutely of an unlimited line of his successors. They would accordingly be very glad if the right hon. Gentleman would either sanction an appeal or a reference to arbitration, so that they might not be at the mercy or discretion of a single officer.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, it would obviously be necessary, in case great changes took place under this Bill, to have the power of dealing with gentlemen already in possession of office and emoluments. Many medical men had distinct contracts, and in their cases compensation must, of course, be calculated according to the terms of their contracts. Many of them, however, who were in the enjoyment of private practice would, of course, be unwilling to take the position of resident medical officer, or to continue as superintendent medical officers, to the asylum or workhouse infirmary, and this clause had been drawn with the simple object of doing them justice. For what the hon. Member had been good enough to say of him he felt obliged, but he trusted that any one hereafter occupying the same official position would be equally ready and anxious to do justice; remembering also that for every act his successors would be responsible to that House. Had any hon. Member suggested that the Poor Law Board should be relieved of this responsibility he should have been most willing to entertain the suggestion; but the Bill had now been a considerable time before the House and the public, no such Amendment had been suggested, and he therefore felt bound to accept the responsibility. He was quite sure that, with the assistance which any hon. Member at the Poor Law Board could command, there would be no difficulty in arriving at a right decision.

MR. BRADY said, he believed that the introduction of the system now proposed would deteriorate the class of medical attendants.

MR. AYRTON said, that those who wished to elevate the medical profession placed their claims too high. If a doctor joined a union, and reserved the right of going away when he pleased, it was too much for him to say that he held an office for life, and ought not to be removed without compensation. If a man claimed an office for life he ought to be liable to serve for life. The right hon. Gentleman in inserting this clause in the Bill only followed the precedent laid down in all other cases where a reform was sought to be effected, and it was necessary to remove certain officers.

MR. BRADY said, that instead of claiming for life, a large proportion of the medical officers were in the position of tenants-at-will. Their duties were performed in a most trustworthy manner, and their claims ought to be taken into consideration.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he wished to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman would have any objection to make the decision of the Poor Law Board communicable by "general order?"

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that no order could be made without instructions from the person properly responsible at the Poor Law Board—that was the President—and it did not carry the matter any further if the papers were sent round in a box for the signature of the President's colleagues. As soon as they saw his signature there, they added theirs as a matter of course, and there was an end of the matter. Last year he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone) as having signed a particular order some years ago, but he shook his head, saying it was very likely, but that he knew nothing of it.

MR. GILPIN said, that the claims of medical officers were sufficiently met by the provision for compensation. One part of the clause had attracted considerable attention out of doors, and that was whether in the appointment of resident medical officers, the oversight of the first-class medical outdoor officers would be dispensed with. He trusted that no such practice would be introduced.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, it was intended that the resident medical officer should not be one of the highest class, but capable of attending cases as they came in. The infirmaries would still be under the supervision of one having the highest professional knowledge; in fact, it was intended to copy the plan pursued in hospitals.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he thought there was a great distinction between a general order and a simple order. If the former were signed by three Cabinet Ministers who knew nothing of its contents, they must repose great confidence in those who drew it up. Though the powers given by the Bill were very useful, they were very great, and some of them remarkable. There were powers for buying land, for taking buildings, for selling houses, and for giving compensation, all to be executed by the simple order of the President who represented the Poor Law Board. If there was a mode of making the President's act more solemn than the mere signing of his name, he thought that mode ought to be adopted. Every order should be very carefully considered before three Cabinet Ministers were called upon to sign it. He thought the suggestion of his hon. Friend (Sir Harry Verney) a very useful one.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Baronet with respect to the dismissal of an officer, would be introducing quite a novelty. At the present moment an officer was dismissed on an order signed by the President of the Board. He had not had much experience in general orders; but in signing orders as the President of the Poor Law Board, he had always felt most deeply the responsibility resting upon him, and had always studied the papers on any particular matter very carefully before giving directions for the preparation of an order upon it. He thought the responsibility of the President, who was the responsible officer so far as the House of Commons was concerned, was sufficient in these matters.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 60 to 62, inclusive, agreed to.

Mr. Gilpin

Clause 63 (Account at Bank of England.)

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the representatives of the Bank thought its wording disrespectful to them; accordingly he moved that the clause should be altered, so as to require the Receiver to open an account with the Governor and Company of the Bank of England.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 64 agreed to.

Clause 65 (Collection of Common Fund.)

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, it appeared that under this clause the Poor Law Board could, under their seal, make the various parishes pay up their contributions. He took it to be the intention of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy), that the unions or parishes should pay the whole amount of their quota into the common fund after each half-yearly audit. That, however, seemed to involve a larger amount than some of the parishes would be able to pay, because the entire £350,000 would be paid away by the parishes to the managers of the asylums and dispensaries before they could get repaid from the common fund, so that they should really pay twice before they could get recouped. It appeared that in the western districts the parishes would have to pay in £33,285 and receive out £2,625; in the northern districts pay in £14,000 and receive back £1,200; in the central districts pay in £28,000 and receive back £15,000; in the eastern districts pay in £2,300 and receive back £35,900; in the southern districts pay in £8,500 and receive back £31,000; so that the amount paid in would be £86,215, and that received back £86,215 likewise. He wished to leave it open to the Poor Law Board to make arrangements not to call on certain parishes in such a way as to oblige the latter to spend thousands in interest for raising the money. He thought some arrangement might be made by which the parishes which had spent the money in paying the managers of the asylums, dispensaries and schools, might be credited with the amount disbursed when they came to pay their quota to the fund.

MR. AYRTON said, in point of fact, the rates would have to be raised twice—once from the union and once from the common fund; but by a slight alteration in Clause 70 that difficulty could be obviated.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, it was quite true the unions would have to raise the first half-year. They would then be recouped all they had a right to from the common fund; and for their next half-year they would only raise what was sufficient. It would not be necessary for parishes afterwards to raise these very large sums, because they would have money coming in from the common fund. He should be happy if any practical way of doing that differently were suggested.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that according to the provisions of the clause, the parishes would be constantly in advance of the common fund, and this would weigh very heavily on the poorer parishes. It would be well if the right hon. Gentleman made some alteration in the clause.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, the Receiver would be able to make arrangements with the parishes for the payments.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, the rate for the first half-year would amount to £170,000, and as that must be all raised beforehand, the interest, which at 5 per cent would amount to something like £8,000, would have to be thrown away—in other words, an additional rate of 3*d.* in the pound would have to be made.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 66 to 68, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 69 (Application of Common Fund.)

EARL GROSVENOR said, he had to move an Amendment. The object of his Amendment was to put these buildings upon the common fund. They were not at all specified in the Bill, and he wished them to be placed upon the common fund.

Amendment proposed,

In page 14, line 31, after the word "say," to insert the words "for the purchasing, hiring, building, repairing, fitting up of buildings for the asylums, and any sum in the nature of rent or other compensation payable by the managers to the guardians, in respect of the use for the asylum of a building previously used as a workhouse: Provided always, That all estimates and contracts made by the managers shall be submitted to the Poor Law Board, or to an officer by it appointed, for approval, before any agreements are signed."
—(Earl Grosvenor.)

MR. AYRTON said, he trusted the President of the Poor Law Board would have no hesitation in accepting this Amendment, considering the quarter whence it came. If it were proposed in a spirit of hostility, no doubt the right hon. Gentleman would be justified in opposing it; but, considering that it had reference to charges which would fall upon the mover, it indicated an extreme desire on his part to bear his full share of the burdens of the metropolis. He was not aware that any one objected to the Amendment, and the Members for the City had expressed their readiness to bear their share of the burden. The right hon. Gentleman might have been justified in limiting the Bill at first, but he was now justified in accepting the proposal of the noble Earl, which was highly honourable to him, considering the position which he occupied.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that no one in the House appreciated more highly than himself the honourable intention of the noble Earl; but he had received deputations on the subject, and he felt bound to resist the Amendment, because it seemed to him to be unjust in itself. A great number of unions had gone to great expense in getting their buildings into good repair, so that with very little additional expenditure they would be able to provide the accommodation they required. It was not only a question of the present condition of these workhouses, but large numbers of lunatics and others would be removed, and many wards would thus be set free for other uses. There were twenty-four of the unions and parishes that had done much to supply efficient buildings, and Parliament was bound to take into consideration the expenditure they had freely incurred to supply what was needed in their own district. The parish of St. Leonard, Shoreditch, had expended enormous sums upon their workhouse, and when the lunatics, &c., were removed, the present building would provide accommodation for their own sick. St. George's-in-the-East had also done much in the same direction. What he objected to in the Amendment was that a new burden would be cast upon such parishes, if other parishes which had not expended so much as they ought to have done were to profit by this expenditure. Several parishes had been suspending their buildings for a short time in order to see what took place in that House, and complications of which the House was not aware would occur, which would render the difficulty of carrying out the Bill much greater than it would otherwise be. So far he had limited the power of the Board to what was reasonable and fair, but that would be the case no longer if these buildings were to be used as asylums for the whole of the metropolis. If one of these buildings was used for the whole metropolis then the Poor Law Board could make the whole metropolis pay for it. If these parishes had not sufficient accommodation let them build for themselves, and not come upon those who had expended large sums for these buildings.

MR. GOSCHEN said, that in judging whether the Amendment should be carried a great deal would depend upon whether the metropolis were or were not to be one district for asylum purposes. If one it would be immaterial whether the expense came out of the common fund or the individual fund. But if the districts were to be numerous, and differing in size and wealth, the difference of placing the expense on one or the other fund would be very great. Under the 6th clause the Poor Law Board would have power to form the districts as they pleased, and afterwards to remodel them; and in this way the Board would be able to make an approach as near as it chose to an equalization of the rating. He took the proposal to be that the whole expense of the asylums should be put into one common pot, so to say; and then remuneration would have to be given to those parishes which had already provided asylums, and in this way justice would be done. He would ask whether it was intended to place the small pox and fever hospitals as well as the asylums on the common fund?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, his view was that with respect to lunatics, fever, and small pox patients this was a metropolitan question, and he would make the district equal to the whole of the metropolis, with asylums conveniently situated east, west, north, and south. When one asylum was full they must be sent to another, but they would all be managed by one body. But with regard to other classes of the poor it had never been his intention so to act. Many of the parishes were of large size, and some had already provided either a separate hospital for their workhouses or a hospital which at very little expense might be made available as such. Those who had upon their own ground provided all that could be required ought not to be called upon to contribute towards places that were not so provided. He was not aware how the metropolis would be divided, and he could not, therefore, answer the question of the right hon. Gentleman. Some of the parishes which were among the very poorest had provided everything upon their own ground, and he did not think that justice would be done to them under this Amendment.

Mr. Gathorne Hardy

MR. LOCKE said, that he was surprised that any difficulty had been found in this matter. Originally, it was intended that the expense of erecting these asylums should be borne by a common fund, and why that intention was not adhered to he could not understand. What would be the operation of the Act in the case of several poor parishes, say on the Surrey side of the water, having to build an asylum for the purposes of the Act. Would they have to pay for it out of their own funds? Some arrangement was desirable whereby an equitable adjustment of these charges might be made in respect to the building of asylums. These districts would probably be formed in one case by joining several poor parishes together, and in another by the union of several rich parishes; but the duty of building asylums must fall at the outset indiscriminately upon the rich and poor. This would involve a serious outlay in the case of the latter, and he hoped that some arrangement might be made for throwing the cost upon the common fund.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he was of opinion that if the proposal of the noble Lord were rejected, a serious burden would be thrown upon the poorest and most unhealthy parishes.

MR. AYRTON said, he had understood that the President of the Poor Law Board would make one district for the purpose of providing these asylums so that the charge would extend over the whole of the metropolis; but in that case some provision ought to be made for equitable adjustment in the case of parishes which had already erected buildings at considerable expense.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he hoped the clause would not be altered. He knew some districts which had built largely for the poor; but under the proposed Amendment they might be treated as if they had done nothing.

MR. GOSCHEN said, those districts would be entitled to compensation.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK: But the compensation might be neutralized by charges for new buildings.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 35; Noes 97: Majority 62.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he rose to move the addition to the clause at page 14, after line 31, of the following words:—

"For the maintenance in a sufficient number of duly regulated hospitals, and under the care of trained nurses, of the sick poor; together with the cost of training nurses."

His object was the cure of all the sick poor of the metropolis. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would accept that Amendment in the interest of the sick poor. The treatment of the sick poor in the metropolis was so bad as to have roused public indignation, and to have called for the introduction of that Bill, which it was desirable to make, as far as possible, a perfect measure. It was the common interest of all the inhabitants of the metropolis that all the sick poor who could be cured should be so, and the charge for that purpose ought to be defrayed from the common fund. The President of the Poor Law Board had admitted that the cost of the lunatic poor of the metropolis should be borne by a common fund; and what reason could be urged why the charge of the sick poor of the metropolis should not be borne by a common fund? All sick cases should be taken out of the category of pauper cases. It was to give effect to that principle that he proposed this Amendment.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he gave every credit to the hon. Baronet for his benevolent intentions; but the carrying out of his principles would be injurious rather than beneficial to the sick poor. The Amendment was entirely inconsistent with the framework of the Bill. The effect of the Amendment would be to bring about what the hon. Baronet himself would deprecate—namely, a levelling of the sick poor who had hitherto not been relieved by the poor rates with the vicious and degraded poor. That would be one of the greatest wrongs that could be done to those of the sick poor who were distinguished from paupers. As the Poor Law Board was not yet prepared to supply trained nurses to the metropolitan hospitals no charge could be put on the rates for nurses, because it was only nurses who had been trained like those trained by Miss Nightingale in respect of whom the rate-payers could be charged. It was, of course, desirable that nurses should be duly trained;

but who was to decide when they were so? He rejoiced that there was a prospect of obtaining efficient nurses, and that there would be the means of training them; but if he accepted that Amendment, he could not have the power of paying any nurses unless they had been trained, which in many instances they had not been. His desire was to treat the sick poor in the workhouses with humanity in every respect, taking care that they should, as far as possible, be free from physical and moral associations calculated to do them harm.

Amendment negatived.

EARL GROSVENOR moved, in section 2, after the word "smallpox" to insert "cancer or syphilis."

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, there was no occasion for any new hospital for cancer. The number of cases were so few that it was scarcely worth while to throw them on the common fund. He had a report from a workhouse to show that out of 476 cases there were only two of a cancerous kind. In another workhouse out of 463 cases there were only two cases of cancer. In a whole month, in forty workhouses of the metropolis, there were only nineteen cancer cases. It was most undesirable that such cases should be brought to the workhouses at all; they should be brought to places where they would get surgical treatment. A great many of the workhouse authorities had sent patients affected with the other disease referred to to the Lock Hospital. It was necessary to treat such cases separately. It was objectionable that a person of excellent character with an ulcerated leg should be placed in a ward with a person afflicted with the other disease, and brought into connection with persons with whom he would never wish to associate. He did not think this was a class of patients that had any particular claim on the common fund. If they could keep those persons in until they were cured there would be some advantage, but they could go in and out as often as they pleased. At no time did their number in the workhouses exceed 150.

EARL GROSVENOR said, he thought unless the Amendment were adopted that it would be impossible to keep the Lock patients separate from the rest. Would it not therefore be better to put those patients on the common fund in order to insure that object? The fact of the unions having subscribed to the Lock Hospital, showed the necessity of keeping these cases separate. He would not press the Amendment as far as cancer was concerned.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, that two objects which had been confused, though quite distinct in themselves, were aimed at by the establishment of the common fund—the one to relieve the poor parishes, the other to secure better treatment for the sick. The question was why, if fever and small pox were cast upon the common fund, should not cancer and syphilis also? The cases were very numerous or they were not. If they were very numerous, then the burden of providing for them would be very heavy if left upon poor parishes; if they were not, the additional expense that might be cast upon the common fund would not be much.

Amendment negatived.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 70 to 78, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 79 (Addition of nominated Guardians.)

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, that the elected guardians were decidedly averse to this power of nomination on the part of the Poor Law Board, and its exercise was likely to create great dissatisfaction. It would practically set aside the present Boards of Guardians. He hoped that the clause would be omitted.

MR. BUTLER said, that by the principle of this clause a blow was struck at local government. The largest parishes in the metropolis were without resident justices of the peace. In St. George's-in-the-East there were few persons rated at £40 a year, and 21 per cent of that large parish were absolutely receiving relief at the present time.

MR. AYRTON said, that the ex officio and nominated guardians, taken together, should not exceed one-third of the full number of elected guardians, or they might have no ex officio guardians. He did not see why they should have both ex officio and nominated guardians.

MR. HIBBERT said, that the effect of the clause would be to make the Poor Law Board guardians for the whole metropolis.

MR. LAYARD said, his constituents on the south side of the water were highly satisfied with the Bill as a whole; but they entertained a strong objection to this clause, which he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would withdraw.

SIR JOHN SIMEON said, he trusted that the President of the Poor Law Board would not withdraw the clause. The poor felt that the Poor Law Board was their protector, and the real guardian of the poor.

Earl Grosvenor

MR. LOCKE said, he thought the clause unnecessary, inasmuch as its object would be sufficiently met by the existing law, which made justices of the peace ex officio guardians. If this clause were persisted in the effect would be to ultimately to do away with guardians altogether.

MR. CANDLISH said, he considered the clause to be objectionable, dangerous, a great blot on the Bill, and a serious inroad on representative Government, and he wished to ask if it were really essential to the Bill.

MR. J. STUART MILL said, he wished to ask if it were worth while risking the popularity of the measure for the sake of the clause. Boards of Guardians, who had hardly any power left, except in relation to the outdoor poor, would be quite as fit to inspect asylums, &c., without nominee guardians as with them.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, that as the Poor Law Board would have power to nominate one-third of the managers of dispensaries, asylums, and schools, the additional power of nominating one-third of the guardians would practically give the Poor Law Board more than one-third of the power of control, and that no provision was made for the nominee guardians going out of office.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, that the clause was entirely permissive; the word was not "shall" but "may." It was inserted because of the special duty the guardians had to perform in reference to the asylums. It might happen that in some districts there might be no district asylums, but a hospital or infirmary confined to a particular union. Having asked for nominees in the case of the managers, it was thought only right to ask for the permissive power to nominate guardians in large unions. If, however, the Board were well supplied with ex officio guardians, he should not think of forcing nominees upon them, and there need be little apprehension that the power of the Poor Law Board would be abused. If the power of nomination were to be given to the Poor Law Board with reference to managers, it seemed more important that it should be extended to guardians than to dispensary committees, upon which he understood there was some anxiety to have nominees.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, nothing had been said for the ratepayers in this question. He thought a due consideration of their interests should induce the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw this clause. He upheld the principle of representation as opposed to nomination. In the words of the popular song, he would say, "Oh, woodman, spare that tree!"

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped that in any event the number of nominated members would not be allowed to exceed one-third of the whole.

MR. WYLD said, he thought the Committee were really much indebted to the right hon. Gentleman for the care he had bestowed on this Bill. He believed it would effect great and permanent good; but this clause would go far to nullify its beneficial effects. If the Bill, excellent as it was, applied to the whole country, it would be simply impossible to carry it with such a provision; but in such cases the metropolis was always victimised. The clause introduced a perfectly novel principle, that of nomination, in the case of a body which, to a certain extent, would possess taxing powers.

MR. AYRTON said, he wished to know if the right hon. Gentleman would agree to the suggestion which he had made?

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he had no objection to the clause being amended to the extent suggested by the hon. Member.

AN hon. MEMBER said, if the clause were applied to the whole of England, the right hon. Gentleman would run great risk of losing this good Bill. In fact, the clause ran counter to the principle of the constitution, and allowed the nominees of the Poor Law Board to override the will of the representatives of the ratepayers.

MR. A. SMITH said, he differed entirely from the last speaker, and thought the experiment of allowing perfectly impartial persons to interest themselves on this subject ought to be encouraged. He sincerely thanked the right hon. Gentleman for his Bill.

Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 92; Noes 27: Majority 65.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

MR. PERCY WYNDHAM said, it was of great importance to prevent the dissemination of infectious and contagious diseases by the conveyance of sick persons to asylums in ordinary vehicles. Properly constructed carriages ought to be provided for the purpose, and, indeed, this principle had already been recognised by Parliament in regard to parochial matters. Under the present system he believed all kinds of conveyances were used; but this practice was obviously objectionable and ought to be put a stop to. He therefore moved the insertion, after Clause 28, of the following clause:—

"Where the asylum is provided for the reception and relief of the sick, every such asylum shall be provided with a hospital carriage, of such a pattern as the Poor Law Board shall approve, for the conveyance of persons suffering from small pox, fever, or other infectious disease."

MR. GATHORNE HARDY said, he thought that, under the 20th clause, everything which the hon. Gentleman desired would be provided for. That clause was to the effect that all necessary Fixtures, Furniture, and Conveniences should be provided, and he thought those words would meet the case. The suggestion of his hon. Friend was a most excellent one, and he believed it would be carried out under the clause.

Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Preamble agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered upon Wednesday.

SUGAR DUTIES BILL—[BILL 37.]

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer.)

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration read.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. HUNT stated, that in consequence of some arrangement respecting the drawback upon sugar between this country and Holland, the third reading of the Bill would be postponed to this day fortnight.

Bill to be read the third time upon Monday, 25th March.

House adjourned at a quarter before Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, March 12, 1867.

MINUTES.]—PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Shipping Local Dues * (41); Duty on Dogs * (42); Railway Traffic Protection (43). Second Reading—Recovery of Certain Debts (Scotland) (14).

RAILWAY TRAFFIC PROTECTION BILL.

PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

LORD REDESDALE, in presenting a Bill for securing the traffic on railways from interruption by the creditors of companies, said, that at this moment very great apprehension was felt by certain railway companies lest proceedings might be taken against them by individual creditors, which would have the effect of stopping the working of their lines. An inquiry was going on in "another place" on this subject, and it was extremely desirable that no steps should be taken by any individual while that inquiry was pending, which might tend to the inconvenience of the public, or to the injury of the general body of the creditors of those companies. The Bill which he begged to lay on the table would suspend the power of proceeding against railway companies until the 1st of August, with the intention of the measure being renewed by that time, or modified by legislation of a different character. In that way great relief would be given, and railway property would be secured from invasion by single creditors.

A Bill for securing the Traffic upon Railways from Interruption by the Creditors of Companies—Was presented by The Lord REDESDALE; read 1^a. (No. 43.)

RECOVERY OF CERTAIN DEBTS (SCOTLAND) BILL—(No. 14.)

(The Lord Chancellor.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, it was one which was likely to be favourably received in Scotland. He had himself presented a petition in its support from the Scottish Trade Protection Society, signed by 1,500 merchants, bankers, manufacturers, and tradesmen; and a noble and learned Friend near him had also presented a petition in favour of it from the Chambers of Commerce in Scotland. He was not aware that any petition had been presented against the measure except one; but the interests of the law agents in Scotland—whose opposition was not unnatural—he was convinced would not be injured by the change. The provisions of the Bill, their Lordships would find, were very simple. Under the Small Debts Act in Scotland, the Sheriff had a jurisdiction to the extent of £12. These powers of the Sheriff Court had, he believed, been very efficiently exercised; and there had been in consequence a great desire felt in Scotland that the jurisdiction of the Sheriff in the recovery of debts should be extended to the amount of £50. The present Bill was introduced for the purpose of meeting that wish as to a certain class of debts—those, namely, where the creditor was compelled to bring his claim within three years. This class of debts was very well known, and had been established by judicial decisions, and included merchants' accounts, servants' wages, and other matters of that sort. Under the law as it stood, the decision of the Sheriff, whether principal or substitute, was final; but there was an appeal in some cases from the Sheriff Substitute's Court to the Sheriff, whose decision was final. It was proposed in this Bill that the same summary jurisdiction which exists under the Small Debt Acts should be extended to £50; but it was also proposed that there should be still an appeal to the Sheriff from the Sheriff Substitute in cases where debt was between £12 and £25; and with regard to cases in which the claim was over £25, there should be an appeal to the Court of Session. With regard to appeals from the decision of the Sheriff Substitute to the Sheriff, it was provided by the Bill that there should be no appeal unless either of the parties, before any evidence has been taken, shall make requisition that a note of the evidence be taken. He believed that the extension of jurisdiction would not only be extremely satisfactory to the classes of Scotch people interested, but that the expenses also of recovering small debts would thereby be considerably diminished. He was told that obtaining a decree, in absence of a defence, costs under the present system 40s.; whereas, under the provisions of the present Bill, should it become law, it will be obtained for a debt of £20, at the cost of 5s., if no law agent should be employed, and an additional 5s. should the services of an agent be retained; and 10s. for a debt between £25 and £50. It was proposed that this extended jurisdiction should not be compulsory, and that if a Sheriff, before whom a claim might be brought, should think that the case was not one which ought to be dealt with in a summary manner, then he would have power to remit the case to his ordinary jurisdiction, as though this Bill had not become law. There were other details of a technical character; but he need not trespass on their time by discussing them, especially as there was ample evidence before their Lordships of the existence of a very general, almost unanimous, desire in Scotland in favour of the measure.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

BRITISH NORTH AMERICA BILL.

(The Duke of Buckingham and Chandos.)

(NO. 38.) COMMONS AMENDMENTS.

Commons Amendments considered (according to Order.)

LORD LYVEDEN said, he desired some information with regard to a collateral subject—the Imperial guarantee of the loan for constructing the Intercolonial Railway.

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, that a Resolution on the subject would be laid before the House of Commons within a week, and it was proposed to defer the progress of the present Bill until the discussion had taken place on that Resolution.

LORD REDESDALE asked whether the guarantee was to be permanent or for a term of years?

THE DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM said, that he must defer his answer to these questions of detail until a Bill founded on the Resolution should have been laid on the table of the other House.

Amendments agreed to.

House adjourned at half past Five o'clock, to Thursday next, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, March 12, 1867.

MINUTES.]—NEW MEMBER SWORN—Hon. Octavius Duncombe, for York County (North Riding).

SELECT COMMITTEE—On Divorce Bills nominated; on Fire Protection appointed; on Limited Liability Acts, Mr. Kirkman Hodgson added.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Oxford and Cambridge Universities Education.

Considered as amended—Dublin University Professorships * [59].

Third Reading—(£369,118 5s. 6d.) Consolidated Fund,* and passed.

CATTLE PLAGUE—COMPENSATION FOR SLAUGHTERED CATTLE.—QUESTION.

MR. READ said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, To whom the Owners of Cattle slaughtered by Inspectors from August to November, 1865, are to apply for compensation, and through what channel such compensation will be paid?

MR. HUNT said, in reply, that the owners must send their claims in to the clerk of the local authorities, who would forward them to the Privy Council. When they had been duly verified they would be sent to the Treasury, and payment would be made by the Paymaster General.

MR. READ said, he wished to know who would verify the certificates—the local authorities or the Privy Council?

MR. HUNT: Both.

MR. REBOW said, that the answer of the hon. Gentleman was directly opposed to what had been stated by Mr. Corry. That right hon. Gentleman said that the claims must go through the Clerk of the Peace for the County.

MR. HUNT: There is no contradiction, for the Clerk of the Peace is generally the clerk of the local authorities.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE—REFORM STATISTICS.—QUESTION.

MR. LOWE said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether he will lay upon the table a Return for every Borough in England and Wales, showing—the Name of Borough; the number of Male Occupiers below £10 rental; the number of Male Occupiers at £30 rental and upwards; and the number of Male Occupiers at £7 rental and under?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: All the information, Sir, that the right hon. Gentleman wishes to have is really upon the table or in the Library of the House. If the right hon. Gentleman will look at the Return of Mr. Baines, No. 81 of last year, and at that of Mr. Horsfall, No. 494, he will find in them all the information he requires. At the same time, if it would be for the convenience of the House, or of the right hon. Gentleman, that it should be produced in a tabular form, we shall be happy to give it him. But I can assure him that the clerks in the Poor Law Board are much overworked at this moment.

STALYBRIDGE RAILWAY STATION.
QUESTION.

MR. CHEETHAM said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, Whether the attention of the Board has been directed to the very inconvenient and dangerous condition of the Stalybridge Station of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway and Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Companies; and, if so, whether the Board has had any Communication with the Companies upon the subject, with a view to oblige them to make better arrangements for the convenience and safety of the public?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE: Yes, Sir, the attention of the Board of Trade has been so directed. On December 8, 1865, and on June 18, 1866, the Mayor of Stalybridge called the attention of the Board to the "disgraceful condition" of this station. On the 15th of December, 1865, and 11th of July, 1866, Colonel Yolland inspected and reported against it. His recommendations have been communicated to the two Companies in question. The Board of Trade wrote again on the 12th of September, 1866, to both Companies. The Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire replied on the 15th that they were in communication with the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, and on the 21st the Lancashire and Yorkshire replied that they were in communication with the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire. A further reminder was sent to both Companies on the 21st November, to which the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire replied on the 30th that they were still in communication with the Lancashire and Yorkshire. No answer has yet been received from the latter Company. The attitude at present of the two Companies resembles the celebrated position of the two commanders—

"Lord Chatham with his sword drawn
Was waiting for Sir Richard Strachan
Sir Richard, longing to be at 'em,
Was waiting for the Earl of Chatham."

The Board of Trade has no power to compel these Companies to make better arrangements. They are in possession of Colonel Yolland's Reports, which have also been laid before Parliament. The responsibility rests with them, and that responsibility will be very serious should any accident occur in consequence of their neglect of these repeated warnings. Both Companies have Bills before Parliament this Session, and I presume Parliament can refuse to sanction new works communicating with the Stalybridge Station until it has been improved.

SCOTLAND—CANONGATE CHURCH, EDINBURGH.—QUESTION.

MR. MONCREIFF said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is the intention of Government to fill up the present vacancy in the Collegiate Charge of the parish of Canongate, in Edinburgh; and, whether he intends to introduce any measure relative to the Annuity Tax in that parish?

MR. WALPOLE said, in reply, that in consequence of the representations made to the Government, it was not intended to fill up the presentation, and it was under consideration whether they would bring in a Bill relative to the annuity tax.

RAILWAY COMPANIES ARRANGEMENTS
BILL.—QUESTION.

MR. FILDES said, he wished to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade respecting the Railway Companies Arrangements Bill, which Bill stands on the Orders of the Day for Second Reading for Monday, the 29th April, Whether the Second Reading of this Bill is certain to be moved on that day?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE: This Bill, Sir, was postponed to a distant day, in order to give the Government and the country ample time to consider the intricate question of railway legislation. The opinion of all parties will doubtless be guided very much by the proceedings of the Debenture Holders' Committee, by the Royal Commission, and by other circumstances to which I need not advert. If the hon. Member will kindly repeat his question a few weeks hence, I shall probably be able to give him an answer.

OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITIES
EDUCATION BILL.—LEAVE.

MR. EWART, in moving for leave to bring in a Bill to open the benefits of Education in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge to students without obliging them to be Members of a College or Hall in those Universities, said, that as most hon. Members were aware, in former days students were allowed to live at the Universities without belonging to any College or Hall. Colleges were intended for the cheap education of students, instead of which they enhanced the cost of it. There were said to have been at one time 30,000 students at Oxford, and as many at Paris. Colleges and Halls, under the name of Hospitia, were afterwards founded. The famous College of the Sorbonne still survived; so did our Colleges and Halls at Oxford and Cambridge. In Germany, Italy, and France free access was allowed to the Universities without obliging students to belong to any College, and education was there very much cheaper than in this country. In Scotland and Ireland the same privilege was enjoyed with the same result. He would appeal, in support of his case, to the testimony of the Commissioners who inquired into the system of University education at Oxford. The Commissioners stated in their Report that—

“No skill or vigilance in colleges would reduce the cost of living so low as it can be by the ingenuity and interest of a student.”

Professor Wall said—

“It is to the admission of students to the University, without connection with a college or hall of any kind, that I look for the greatest good to the University, the Church, and the country.”

Professor Vaughan stated—

“Lodging-houses connected with the University, though not with colleges, would extend the University system. I think such a change would at this moment be opportune, as well as advantageous.”

In the University of Aberdeen the average expense of a student for five months was £20 or £25. A great many Scotch students were obliged to work in the farm in vacation, and this witness stated that—

“One who holds the plough and cuts the harvest is one of the best scholars that ever was within the walls of a University.”

He was struck the other day in reading in The Times a quotation, from a letter which referred to Scotch students in Aberdeen, to the effect—

“In reference to the Senior Wranglers who have come from Aberdeen during the last few years, it is no disparagement to say that the majority of them have roughed their way upwards from the very humblest ranks of life. Unless parents among the working classes in England are brought to feel the importance of educating their boys—and education is realized as a parental duty—the Wranglers will still come from the other side of the Tweed.”

It might be said that immorality would result from the lodging-house system; but precautions might be taken to have licensed lodging-houses. Wealthy students could lodge in Professors' houses. Dissipation would be beyond the means of the poor. He considered that the measure he proposed was at once a Liberal and Conservative one. Liberal because it threw open the portals of the Universities; Conservative because it revived the usages, and restored the original character of those venerable institutions. He was convinced that it would promote the lasting interests of the Universities and the nation.

Moved, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to open the benefits of education in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge to students, without compelling them to be Members of a College or Hall in those Universities.—(Mr. Ewart.)

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he did not rise at that stage to oppose the Bill; but, as a son of one of our Universities, must really protest against the system which was growing to such a height in that House of dry-nursing those institutions. It seemed to him that the Universities were far more capable of knowing what they wanted, and of carrying out the necessary measures for supplying it, than certain hon. Gentlemen opposite, all of them devoted friends to those venerable corporations, according to their own account of themselves. He did not dispute the archæology of the hon. Member in what he had said of the University system in ancient times—which meant that the students of Oxford in the Middle Ages were very much like the gentlemen who now met on Saturday afternoon in Trafalgar Square. The Universities had by their charters and constitution great recuperative powers, which the University Reform Bills of the last twelve or fourteen years had increased, and they had since been actively engaged upon measures of Reform. If it should be desirable to admit external students at Oxford and Cambridge, both Oxford and Cambridge had it in their own power to provide for their admission. If that change were to be carried out, he ventured to say that the method of doing it best suited to Oxford would on that very account not be the method best suited to Cambridge, a University which possessed, though some people seemed to forget it, its own system and its own traditions. Fourteen years ago there was an Oxford Reform Bill, which he was willing to believe was very much wanted. A year afterwards a similar Bill for Cambridge, which was not so much wanted, was brought in and hurried through almost sub silentio, because it was thought by Members to be only the second series of the novel of the preceding season. Oxford and Cambridge had ample means of acting for themselves in that matter; and that being merely a question of University discipline, if they saw fit to admit external students, they would do so without leave or licence from the hon. Member for Dumfries. Still, he desired to see what the Bill was before raising any opposition to it. He trusted that he would then find it merely nugatory, and not mischievous. Better than nugatory he could not expect it to be.

“Chronica si penses cum pugnant Oxonienses, Post aliquot menses volat ira per Angligenenses;”

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE also desired to see the Bill, and had no intention to oppose its introduction. Not only had the Universities power to do that which, as far as he could gather, the hon. Member for Dumfries (Mr. Ewart) desired to do, but at that very moment the question was under consideration at the University of Oxford, whether or not it was fitting to adopt some such plan as the hon. Gentleman's measure purported to effect. It might, he thought, be safely left to the University authorities to consider the mode of extending the benefits of those institutions.

COLONEL SYKES said, that at Aberdeen, in consequence of the numerous small bursaries that existed, persons had been enabled to go through a University education who could not have had any prospect of doing such a thing on this side of the Tweed. He had presented a petition a few years ago from seven parochial schoolmasters in Aberdeenshire, whose salaries were exceedingly small, and out of the seven no fewer than five were Masters of Arts who had gone through the University of Aberdeen. He could also name a score of persons who, by means of the bursary system in the Aberdeen Universities, had risen almost from the labouring class of Scotland to the highest possible literary and scientific eminence. The system, however, he was sorry to say, had been injuriously affected by the recent changes connected with the union of the colleges at Aberdeen.

MR. EWART, in reply, said, he did not, of course, object to the Universities effecting improvements themselves; but he maintained that that House had a right to see that good measures were adopted, as far as they could be, in those great institutions.

Mr. Beresford Hope

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. EWART, Mr. NEATE, and Mr. POLLARD-URQUHART.

• FIRE PROTECTION

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. M'LAGAN, in moving the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the existing legislative provisions for the protection of Life and Property against Fire, said, that the numerous fires which had occurred within the last few years, the mystery with which the origin of many of them had been invested, the suspicious character of not a few of them, and the serious losses, both of life and property, with which others had been attended, had directed public attention to the whole question of fires. There was a strong opinion abroad that a Parliamentary inquiry should be instituted, with the view of devising the best means that could be adopted for the protection of life and property from fire. He but joined in the expression of that opinion in asking for the appointment of a Select Committee, which would be a natural sequence to the Select Committee on Fires in the Metropolis, which sat in 1862, of which the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Thomson Hankey) was Chairman, and to which we were indebted for much useful information and many valuable suggestions. The principal points to which he wished the inquiries of the Committee should be directed were—first, the proper construction of public buildings and warehouses, upon which depended very much the prevention of fires spreading; second, the means for extinguishing fires, under which head were included the supply of water and the arrangements and appliances that could be brought into action on the outbreak of a fire, such as the establishment of fire brigades, fire-engines, &c.; and third, the expediency of having a judicial investigation into all fires. The importance of providing some means for preventing the ravages of fire was acknowledged at a very early period. The Romans, for instance, had bands of men whose principal duty was to watch for and extinguish fires. About 800 years ago it was enacted in this country that all fires in houses should be extinguished at the ringing of the curfew bell, under a penalty; and about 300 years ago bellmen were appointed in London, whose duty it was to ring the bells at night, and call out, "Take care of your fire and candle; be charitable to the poor, and pray for the dead." So also from time to time Acts had been passed with the view of preventing and of extinguishing fires. But still, the great increase in the number of fires and their devastating character showed that those legislative measures had not proved quite effective. For instance, in London alone the number of fires has increased from 681 in 1840 to 1,487 in 1864—that was, it had been more than doubled in twenty-four years. No doubt there had been an increase also in the number of houses; but the increase in fires had been much greater than the increase in houses. And though the fire extinguishing arrangements were now much more efficient than they were, and had been recently brought under the control of the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the number of fires had consequently somewhat decreased, our means of protection against fire were still inadequate as compared with those in some other cities. For instance, while in London there was only one engine station for every six square miles, there was in Paris 1 1-5th, and in New York 1½ for one square mile; in London there was only one fireman to one square mile; in Paris there were 11 firemen, and in New York 64 firemen to one square mile; in London there was only one fireman to 20,000 inhabitants; in Paris and New York there was one to 1,338 and 676 inhabitants respectively; in London there was only one fire-engine to three square miles; in Paris and New York there were about 1½ to each square mile. He might state that he gave these and other figures very much on the authority of Mr. Young, the author of Fires, Fire Engines, and Fire Brigades. But these arrangements in London, however unfavourable they contrasted with those of Paris and New York, would be reckoned efficient and complete when compared with the provisions against fire that were made throughout the country generally; for if we excepted such towns as Liverpool, Manchester, Edinburgh, Glasgow, &c., matters were in a most unsatisfactory state. Where private Acts had been obtained by which the municipal authorities had been enabled to bring a sufficient supply of water into the towns, to establish efficient forces of firemen and engines, and to take proper precautions in the erection of houses, the results had been most satisfactory. We had a striking instance of that in Liverpool, where, in the five years from 1838 to 1843, upwards of three quarters of a million were lost in warehouse risks. So serious were the losses to the insurance companies, that they were obliged to raise the mercantile rates of insurance from 8s. per cent to 30s. and 40s. per cent. These rates were tantamount to excluding a great deal of property from insurance. The authorities, appreciating the great danger to which much valuable property in the town was exposed from fire, obtained two Acts of Parliament—the one to enable them to introduce a large supply of water to extinguish fires and water the streets only; the other, to give them power to make it imperative on all owners of warehouses to erect and alter their warehouses according to certain conditions and restrictions. The effect of the carrying out of the provisions of these Acts was to cause the rates of insurance to fall again to 8s. per cent. Now, he expected that one of the results of the labours of this Committee, if appointed, would be the adoption in other parts of the kingdom of measures which had proved so beneficial in Liverpool. The present mode of conveying intelligence to the different stations of the breaking out of a fire were most inefficient; he would mention one method in use in America which might be adopted with great advantage in our large cities—he meant a telegraph system. In the principal cities of America as many telegraph stations were established in each district of the cities as were considered sufficient for the speedy acquiring and transmission of information. When a fire occurred intimation was sent to the nearest station, which communicated at once to the central telegraph station, and it in turn transmitted the news to the engine stations. It was of immense importance that early information of the outbreak of a fire should be received, and there was no better way of accomplishing that than by such a system as that in use in America. The next subject of the inquiry of the Committee would be the means of ascertaining the causes of fires. Unfortunately, the information we had hitherto been able to obtain on this point was very scanty; and the short sentence at the end of the greater part of the newspaper reports of fires—"the cause or origin of the fire is not known"—proved how much we had to learn in that respect. The only report of the causes of fires which we had was that issued annually by the London Fire Brigade, which was organized by that able and intrepid superintendent, the late much lamented Mr. Braidwood. To him and his successor, Mr. Shaw, we were mainly indebted for these useful and curious reports on the causes of fires. Inquiries, he believed, were always made by the Brigade into the origin of the fires immediately after they had been subdued; but to show how extremely difficult it was to arrive at the true causes, he might state that 474 out of 1,487 fires in 1864, or nearly 32 per cent, were returned "causes unknown;" while in 1866 the proportion was even larger, for 589 out of 1,338, or 36 per cent, were returned in the same way. He had no doubt that the members of the Fire Brigade were most assiduous in their exertions to discover the truth, and that we might depend upon the Returns being as accurate as could be arrived at under the circumstances; but it was evident that there was a necessity for a more searching investigation being made into all fires by a well-qualified person who was accustomed to receive and sift evidence. Such an investigation would be productive of much good in various ways. On that point the late Mr. Braidwood wrote—

"One of the greatest preventives of carelessness in the use of fires and lights would be a legal inquiry in every case, as it would not only show the faults that had been committed, and thus warn others, but the idea of being exposed in the newspapers would be another motive for increased care."

Mr. Samuel Brown, Fellow of the Institute of Actuaries, also said—

"The minuteness of inquiry will not only tend to give greater facilities of drawing useful conclusions, by enabling the inquirer to classify facts, but will lead, as it has already done, to direct attention to those causes which are of most frequent occurrence, and capable of remedy by watchfulness or change in habits. It serves also to indicate how men of science can give their services most effectually in the preservation of life and property. Thus the greatly increasing cause of fires, 'spontaneous ignition,' has led to some interesting chymical experiments into the nature of substances that may be thus dangerous to society without human agency."

It was likely that if proper inquiries were made into the causes of fires there would be considerably more restrictions placed on the warehousing of certain substances than was the case at present. For instance, we were all afraid of gunpowder being stored near our dwellings, and that material had always been the subject of the greatest precautions, and yet it had been found that very serious explosions, quite as bad as any from gunpowder, would take place when water was brought into contact with nitrate of soda and sulphur heated to a high temperature; and yet few were heard complaining of stores of these substances being near their dwellings, often in proximity to one another. So, also, there were great precautions taken against large quantities of petroleum; and yet turpentine, which had comparative immunity from the rigours of the law, was more ignitable than, and quite as explosive as, well-refined petroleum, as was shown by the dreadful explosion from turpentine which took place in Liverpool some ten or twelve years ago, which shattered and blew down several of the walls of the vaults in which it was stored. One great good that would result from such an investigation as he proposed would be, as Mr. Braidwood said, the reducing the number of fires from carelessness. In the first twenty-one years of the existence of the London Fire Brigade, there were 9,341 fires reported on, of these 2,511 were attributed to curtains, 1,178 to candles, 932 to gas, and only 100 to carelessness. Now, it was quite clear that the curtains would not take fire themselves unless some light or fire was brought to them; nor would the candles cause a serious conflagration unless they were brought too near some inflammable materials. He might safely, therefore, conclude that the greater part of the fires attributed to "curtains" and "candles" were really due to "carelessness." On that point it had been well said—

Mr. M'Lagan

"Carelessness, when reprov'd and shown the right way of proceeding, if persisted in, becomes wilfulness, and should therefore be severely punished. Reading in bed was a fruitful source of fires; and with the knowledge we have, and the instances of its pernicious effects continually occurring, it cannot be called other than wilful—it certainly is not carelessness. The recklessness with which candles, lucifers, gas, the inflammable oils, and other easily kindled materials, are used and treated in everyday life can scarcely be called carelessness, now that the danger arising from their improper treatment is known."

Not long ago he had read of a farm labourer who, being engaged in the stackyard, and having indulged in a smoke, put his pipe into his coat pocket, and while he was working pushed the coat into a stack. The fire in the pipe not being extinguished ignited the coat and then the stack, and in a short time several stacks were burnt down. It was said to be simple carelessness that was the cause of the fire. Hundreds of such cases were occurring every day in town and country, in which valuable property was destroyed and life jeopardized and lost. He had seen a report of a miner being sentenced to ten days' imprisonment, with hard labour, for endangering the lives of his fellow-workmen in a gaseous pit by lighting his pipe by the flame of his safety lamp. Another miner was fined 40s., and in default of payment was committed to the House of Correction for two months, for striking a match and lighting his pipe in the pit. An engine keeper, also, who endangered the lives of his fellow-workmen by careless conduct in the working of his engine rendered himself liable to prosecution; and there was no reason why carelessness in fires should not be similarly dealt with. One of the great benefits that would be derived from a judicial investigation into fires would be the prevention of incendiarism, or, at all events, the reducing of the number of incendiary fires. There was a strong suspicion amounting almost to a certainty that the cause of a great majority of those fires, the causes of which were returned as unknown, was incendiarism. Fire-raising was now a frequent crime; and insurance offices, owing to the great competition among one another, were reluctant to prosecute any individual unless the suspicion was very strong against him. Fire-raising was now become a trade with a gang of swindlers, who made it their sole business to arrange fires with a view of defrauding the insurance offices—

“ Their plan is to take houses in different parts of London and in the suburbs, selecting the premises with an eye to their being as far distant as possible from the Fire Brigade stations. The houses are furnished, and immediately an insurance is effected on one of them the gang prepare the house for the fire and remove the furniture to another house. When the fire takes place they make their escape from the burning tenements with their night clothes over their ordinary clothing.”

Again, he was quoting from a Liverpool paper—

“ The frequency of these conflagrations in Liverpool cotton warehouses when the market is low and their rarity when prices are high is a suspicious circumstance when observed over a long period.”

These statements were corroborated by Mr. Chadwick in an able paper he read before the Social Science Association in 1865—

“ He found that while less than one-half of the properties are insured, nearly three-fourths of those burnt are insured. He asked the late Mr. Braidwood how on any doctrine of chances there could be more burnt of insured than of uninsured houses? His answer was—The brigade were regularly occupied in preventing the spread of fires a large proportion of which they knew were wilful. They came to their conclusion from prima facie circumstantial evidence as to the times and modes of the fires, the recency of insurance, the parties named being in debt or straitened circumstances, suspicions as to the quantities of the stock and furniture consumed, full and high insurances of old tumble-down or inconvenient premises, the immediate production of well-matured and complete plans for re-building the premises, which must have been prepared before the fire.”

Mr. Payne, the coroner of the city of London, for a time held inquests on fires, and he gave as evidence that he found that 23 per cent of them were clearly wilful, that one-half of the remainder were apparently accidental, and the other part from causes unknown, including suspicious causes. But they were not left merely to surmise as to what would be the effect of having a judicial investigation into all fires. Mr. Humphreys, in his evidence before the Select Committee on Fires in the Metropolis, stated that by a recent decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, that Court has no power to inquire into the cause of a fire unless death has ensued. He stated that the holding of inquests upon fires was revived a few years back by the coroner for the City of London, and immediately after that the fires fell one-fourth in proportion. In several of the cities in America an officer called the fire marshal was appointed, whose duty it was to investigate into every fire, whether suspicion attached to it or not; and he had power to examine witnesses on oath. On the institution of this office about twelve years ago there had been only one conviction for arson during the previous thirty years. There were now on an average fifty arrests and six convictions annually. The salutary vigilance which that officer exercised had been the means of reducing the number of incendiary fires in the half-year ending the 31st of May, 1866, to sixty-one, being twenty-one less than it was in the corresponding six months of 1865. In Baltimore, also, there was a fire inspector, who investigated the cause of every fire, and prosecuted when necessary. For the first eighteen months after his appointment there were 223, or about 149 a year. In six years there was a gradual but rapid decline from that number to ten incendiary fires a year. In France an official inquiry was made into the cause of every fire that occurs in small towns and villages by the local authorities, and a report of the investigation was forwarded to the Procureur Imperial; in the large towns in which were courts of justice, the inquiry was instituted directly by the Procureur Imperial. Strict investigations were made into all fires in Russia, Prussia, Poland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Hamburg, and Bremen. In Scotland, within the last two or three months, the Lord Advocate Patton issued a circular to the procurators-fiscal requiring them to institute an investigation into the origin of every fire to which was attached any suspicion, and to satisfy themselves as to the absence of any ground for suspicion in cases of extensive destruction of property or where life had been endangered. The only objection to this investigation was that it was done in private; and therefore it had not the effect of deterring others at a distance from committing the offence. The proper party in England in whom the power of investigating fires should be seated was the coroner. It would be the duty of the Committee to inquire as to the expediency of investing him with this power. The hon. Member concluded by moving for a Select Committee.

MR. KINNAIRD seconded the Motion. Inasmuch as he understood that no opposition was to be offered to the appointment of the Committee, it was not necessary for him to trouble the House further than to say that inquiries such as suggested would prevent the spread of incendiarism; because at present fire insurance offices were put to such expense in conducting investigations in disputed cases, that rather than enter upon them they preferred to pay the claims.

Motion agreed to.

Select Committee appointed, "to inquire into the existing legislative provisions for the protection of Life and Property against Fires in the United Kingdom, and as to the best means to be adopted for ascertaining the causes and preventing the frequency of Fires."—(Mr. M'Lagan.)

And, on March 27, Select Committee nominated as follows:—MR. BEACH, MR. AGAR-ELLIS, MR. GORST, LORD RICHARD GROSVENOR, MR. HORSFALL, MR. KINNAIRD, MR. LANYON, MR. LEEHAN, MR. LUSK, MR. M'LAGAN, MR. MILLER, MR. READ, MR. HENRY B. SHERIDAN, MR. TURNER, and MR. WHITMORE.

DIVORCE BILLS.

Select Committee on Divorce Bills nominated:—THE JUDGE ADVOCATE, MR. HEADLAM, MR. BONHAM-CARTER, MR. DUNLOP, MR. LAWSON, MR. MONCREIFF, COLONEL FRENCH, COLONEL PACKE, and MR. AYNTON.

House adjourned at a quarter before Six o'clock.

Mr. M'Lagan

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, March 13, 1867.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—On Army (India and the Colonies), Colonel Percy Herbert added.

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Inclosure.*

First Reading—Oxford and Cambridge Universities Education * [71]; Inclosure * [72].

Second Reading—Libel [11]; Industrial Schools (Ireland) [17].

Committed to Select Committee—Libel [11].

Committee—Criminal Law [8] [R.P.]; Oyster and Mussel Fisheries * [61].

Report—Oyster and Mussel Fisheries * [61].

Considered as amended—Metropolitan Poor * [66].

LIBEL BILL—[BILL 11.]

(Sir Colman O'Loghlen, Mr. Buines.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN, in moving that the Bill be now read the second time, said, that the question of the law of libel was one of general interest; he would therefore trespass a short time on the attention of the House while he explained the provisions of the Bill, and the existing evils he proposed to amend thereby, trusting that he should be able to advance reasons which would satisfy the House that the Bill ought to be read a second time. In the outset he would say that this measure was substantially the same as that he introduced in 1865, which was received with approbation by the press generally, and was supported by petitions from upwards of seventy proprietors of journals, but which he was obliged to withdraw on account of the pressure of business. It was not deemed expedient to re-introduce the Bill last year; but this Session he had taken the earliest possible period of doing so, in order that the subject might be discussed previous to the more exciting debates upon the Reform Bill. Upwards of sixty petitions had already been presented to the House in favour of the measure, and he should show that its principles were founded upon justice, and that it was suited to meet the exigencies of the case. Happily, the question was one which was entirely outside party politics. The time had arrived when neither party sought to influence matters by press prosecutions, and therefore all parties could approach this question and consider it merely in the light of one of law amendment. Before he called the attention of the House to the provisions of the Bill, he might perhaps be permitted to take a short retrospect of the present law of libel. The House was aware that for a long period the law relating to this subject was part of the common law of the land—and, in fact, there was no exact definition of the word “libel.” Jeremy Bentham had said that the definition of that word in law was so general that it might be taken to mean anything written of a man of which he thought he had grounds of complaint. The present definition seemed to be anything written which tended to bring any person into ridicule, hatred, or contempt. The law as it stood was entirely opposed to the principles of a free press; and indeed it was a wonder to him how, considering the arbitrary laws which governed it, it could have obtained the position it had in this country. It had, however, not obtained that position entirely without the aid of the Legislature, because, after the trials which took place in the cases of the Dean of St. Asaph and Woodfall, a Bill was brought forward by Fox and supported by Pitt, which was carried, and might be called the Magna Charta of the press. By that Act the power of defining libel was taken out of the hands of the Judges, and such questions were left to the juries. That really was the foundation of the liberty that the press at present enjoyed. But it did not do all that was necessary, for various complaints had been from time to time made with regard to the pressure of the law of libel on the press. A long time the maxim prevailed “the greater the truth the greater the libel;” but happily it was now exploded. It was not till 1843 that the Legislature again interfered; but in that year, in consequence of petitions from the Provincial Newspaper Press Association, a Committee was appointed by the House of Lords, and subsequently Lord Campbell introduced a Bill which became law, and effected a very beneficial change, by allowing the person sued to plead the correctness of a report, that he had inserted an apology at the earliest possible moment, that the report was inserted without malice, and in some cases a justification. That was a very valuable extension of the law, and conferred great privileges upon the press; and the consequence was that no further agitation took place in Parliament upon the subject until 1857. In that year a circumstance occurred which caused the attention of Parliament to be again directed to the subject. In that year an action was brought against Mr. Davison, the proprietor of a newspaper—The Durham Advertiser—in consequence of a report which appeared in his paper of the proceedings at a meeting of the Improvement Commissioners at West Hartlepool. To the declaration in that case the defendant pleaded that the report was a correct one, and that no action lay; but on a demurrer the Court of Queen’s Bench ruled that the correctness of a report did not remove from the defendant the responsibility of publishing any libel contained in it. On trial the verdict was for the plaintiff, with a farthing damages; but notwithstanding that those damages were merely nominal, the defendant had to bear his own costs, which exceeded £400. This case led to the presentation of a number of petitions to Parliament praying for an amendment of the law of libel; and the House of Lords again appointed a Select Committee and examined witnesses, the object of the Committee being to inquire into whether immunity should be given to persons publishing bond fide and accurate reports of proceeding of the two Houses of Parliament, of assemblies or public meetings under certain conditions and liabilities. The Select Committee reported in favour of extending protection to bond fide reports in the former case; and that—

“Where an action is brought for an alleged libel in the report of the proceedings of a public meeting lawfully assembled for a lawful purpose, if the report be faithful, the jury shall find a verdict for the defendant unless the plaintiff has sustained actual damage.”

Lord Campbell, accordingly, in 1858, introduced a Bill to carry out the recommendations of the Select Committee; but it did not pass the second reading, being thrown out by a majority of 35 to 7 votes. The matter again slept until 1865, when he (Sir Colman O’Loghlen) introduced his Bill. The measure now before the House consisted of several distinct subjects. In the first place, it dealt with reports of public meetings; in the second, it endeavoured to fix upon the authors of libels the responsibility now resting upon the proprietors of newspapers for publishing them; and the third point had reference to proceedings on indictments for libel. The alterations the Bill made in the law were undoubtedly of a serious character. It would make the speakers at public meetings liable for any scandalous language they might utter ; and so long as the newspaper reporters reported the proceedings accurately, it would relieve them or the proprietors from liability to action. At present any man might get up at a public meeting and attack a man's character, well knowing that unless he imputed to him the commission of an indictable offence, or said something calculated to injure him in his profession or business, he could not be put upon his trial for the words he used, although the newspaper proprietor who reported his words could. In his opinion, a man who went to a public meeting, where he knew his words would be taken down, ought to be as much responsible for what he might say as for what he might write. He knew very well that objections would be raised against alterations in the law of slander—a law which had long existed, and which many would say had been sanctioned by custom and the Judges, and that they could not do so without sapping the very foundations and principles of the law ; but with great respect for the opinions of eminent Judges, he would say that it was fitting that the law should be changed in accordance with changes in the spirit of the times, and he thought he could satisfy the House that there ought to be a change in the law so far as to render persons liable for the speeches they chose to make at public meetings. The very principle of the doctrine that there was a difference between libel and slander was that the latter was not so deliberate as the former. But when it was considered that the speakers at meetings were well aware that their speeches were being taken down by reporters and would be published, and that any person animated by malice might go to a meeting to give vent to calumnies with the express object of getting them reported, a state of the law which exempted them from all liability, and fixed it upon newspaper reporters or proprietors, was disgraceful, and ought not to be allowed to continue. This question was raised in the House of Lords when the Bill of 1858 was before it, and both Lord Campbell and Lord Lyndhurst expressed opinions which were in entire concurrence with those he now enunciated. Lord Lyndhurst said—

“ When you come to consider the circumstances attending a public meeting such as I have described, the principle on which the distinction between written and oral slander is made, hardly applies. A man goes to a meeting prepared with a slander. He sees it taken down ; he speaks it for that purpose ; he knows it will be published. Take, however, another illustration. Supposing I dictate words detracting from the character of another man to a person who puts them down, and I wish him to publish them. In that case I am responsible, and may be indicted for the libel. It is true that in the example we are now considering there is no authority given—no expression of a wish that it should be published. But everybody knows that it is the intention of the speaker that it should be published, and therefore I say the distinction between oral and written slander does not apply to the case we are now dealing with.”—[3 Hansard, cxlix. 963.]

Sir Colman O'Loghlen

And the present Lord Chancellor was of the same opinion, because he said there was no real distinction between talking libels in public and writing them for the purpose of being published ; therefore, reason and justice alike demanded that he should be made responsible for them. Reporters were too much pressed to weigh and consider the matters which they were reporting with such nicety as to detect libels. Very often they wrote at great speed, and folio after folio of their copy was taken away by messengers and despatched to the printers as fast as they wrote it, so that scarcely any time could be given for revision—and, indeed, they might not even know that what they were writing constituted a libel. Yet they or the newspaper proprietors were made liable. One object of the present measure was to give them the same immunity with respect to correct reports of public meetings as they enjoyed in regard to reports of judicial proceedings. That exemption, which they enjoyed by virtue of a legal decision given some sixty or seventy years ago, was originally confined to trials ; but he believed it had been gradually extended to police courts, bankruptcy examinations, and proceedings before other tribunals. He did not propose to give an absolute immunity, but that it should be a defence to an action for libel to plead that the words which formed the subject-matter of the libel were spoken at a public meeting convened for a lawful purpose, open to reporters, and were published without malice, and in the ordinary course of business as a newspaper report ; provided always that the newspaper proprietor consented to publish immediately an apology, or any explanation, not of unreasonable length, sent to him by the person aggrieved, in as conspicuous a place in his paper as that in which the libel was published. An objection might be taken to this that men of straw might make damaging speeches, and that if the remedy against the newspaper were abolished, the injured party would have no remedy at all. The speakers, however, would be liable to a criminal information, and greater mischief, he contended, accrued from the present law than would result from the immunity he proposed. It was obviously very important that the public should be furnished with accurate reports of what took place at the meeting of local bodies, invested with taxing and other powers, and at important railway, bank, or other commercial and public meetings. Mr. Baines, in his evidence before the Lords' Committee, said—

“In large towns public meetings are held almost daily, and frequently several in a day, so as to make it practically impossible for any Editor to read the reports before going to press. Reports are brought in by reporters, very often from distant places, late at night, written out by several different reporters, sent to the printer folio by folio, and sometimes not finished many minutes before the newspaper must be printed and in the post office. This is the every day routine in newspaper offices, both in London and in the country. There is scarcely any kind of meeting where matter is not uttered which by a rigid interpretation of the Law of Libel, especially before its recent improvement, would be actionable. There is, perhaps, scarcely a meeting of the House of Commons at which something is not said that might be actionable, yet the exposures made of evils and wrong-doings are of the highest public utility. If perfect security is required against the publication of libels, the only effectual security is to be found in the censorship of the press. This would, of course, destroy public liberty, and any curtailment of the existing practice of reporting public meetings would strike a severe blow at all kinds of improvement.”

And he proceeded to urge on the Committee the propriety of giving protection to such reports, saying—

“I would further beg to submit to the Committee, that the publicity of the proceedings of public meetings through the press is a very important check on wanton and defamatory statements. I maintain that the press, in this way, prevents and corrects a much greater amount of defamation than it propagates. The very knowledge on the part of speakers that their words will be published, is a check upon them.”

It might, however, be said that no actual grievance existed, since actions of the kind he sought to prevent were never brought. The contrary, however, was the fact. Mr. Dobie, the solicitor to The Times, stated, in his evidence before the House of Lords' Committee, that two actions had been brought against that journal for reports of speeches delivered in that House—one being for a speech by Dr. Lushington, the present Judge of the Admiralty Court, and the other for a speech by Lord George Bentinck, relative to proceedings which had been taken under an old Act against horseracing. In one of those actions justification was pleaded, and the case never came to trial, but The Times had to get rid of the action by paying the plaintiff's costs as well as their own, and the other action was abandoned, but The Times was put to a great expense in preparing their defence. He held in his hand a book by Mr. Evelyn, containing a list of such actions which had been brought from the case of “Davison v. Duncan,” in nearly all of which the jury showed their opinion of the merits by giving only nominal damages, yet in nearly all the newspapers had to pay considerable costs. There was first the case of “Duncan v. Davison,” in 1857, when the damages being a farthing, the costs were over £400. In the following year there was an action against The Sheffield Independent, in consequence of some uncomplimentary allusions made at a trades union meeting, the damages being 1s., and the defendant having to pay his own costs. In 1862 there was the case of “Rogers v. Leader,” against the same journal, for a report of proceedings connected with the workhouse; and the jury, in that instance, exercising their power under Fox's Act, found that the report was not a libel. In 1864 there occurred the case of “Hood v. Cowslade,” which was an action against The Reading Mercury for a report of the proceedings at a meeting of the Board of Health. In that case the Lord Chief Justice said that, in his opinion, under the law as it then stood, a report of proceedings at a public meeting of an organized body was just as privileged as if the proceedings had taken place in a Court of Justice. The attention of the Lord Chief Justice was called to the Durham case, but his Lordship intimated he did not agree with the ruling in that case, adding that public opinion had advanced so much of late years that he was inclined to say that the press had full immunity in publishing reports of proceedings at public meetings such as he had referred to. In another case, against The Nottingham Daily Guardian. It arose out of an electioneering squabble, and was an action for publishing the report of a speech at a public meeting. In this case, although the jury only gave a farthing damages, the defendant had to pay his own costs. In the case of The Dublin Chronicle, an action was brought by a Roman Catholic clergyman for a libel contained in a speech made by a Protestant clergyman, and reported in that paper, and the defendant was put to enormous cost in defending himself. There was another case, tried in 1865, in which an action was brought against the proprietors of The Manchester Guardian for an alleged libel contained in a report of a public meeting, and a second action was brought against the person who had uttered the libel complained of; but the latter action was withdrawn, and the result of the action against the proprietors of The Manchester Guardian was that, on the suggestion of the Judge, a juror was withdrawn; but the proprietors had to pay the costs. He thought that these cases offered sufficient evidence of the existence of a real grievance; and, this being so, the question was how could that grievance be remedied? One proposition he had to make was, that which was made by Mr. Johnson Gedge, the Secretary to the Provincial Press Association, when examined years ago before a Committee of the other House. That gentleman proposed that newspapers should be at liberty to publish reports of all speeches made at public meetings, provided the reports were accurate, and the publishers inserted, if required, a contradiction made by any person complaining of any statement so published, the contradiction, being of moderate length, to be inserted in as prominent a part of the paper as that which contained the original report. The suggestion as to the publication of the contradiction was taken from the French Law of Libel. M. Dupin, having told the House of Commons' Committee that there were few actions for libel in France, was asked—

“Has a person reflected upon in any periodical publication a right to compel the editor to insert his answer to the attack, and, if so, under what circumstances?—He has the right, in any case in which the attack implies an imputation upon his character, to compel the editor to insert his answer, provided that answer is not more than twice as long as the attack. Thus, if an attack is ten lines, your answer must not be more than twenty. In this case, a journal which would refuse the insertion would be condemned to make it by the courts of justice. Nevertheless, the courts of justice have sometimes sanctioned the refusal of the editor to insert the answer if the answer was offensively couched, although the offence was by way of reprisal either against the editor or against others. Is this provision found of practical utility, and does it operate as a useful check upon slander?—This provision granted by the law is very useful.”

Sir Colman O'Loughlen

This provision, then, having been found to have a very beneficial effect in France he (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) believed a similar effect would be produced if it were adopted in England. The main object of the first part of the Bill was therefore to make those who chose to make scandalous statements at public meetings responsible for those statements; and the second object was to give immunity to the press in publishing reports of proceedings at public meetings; but this part of the question was one which he thought might be considered in Committee, and it might be found that the newspapers might be relieved by other means than those which he proposed. Upon this point he was ready to listen to any suggestions or amendments. The second part of the Bill related not only to the press, but to all sorts of actions for libel. It dealt with costs, the most material question in every action for libel. Under the law as it existed in England, unless a plaintiff obtained a verdict for 40s. damages he was not entitled to costs; but in Ireland a farthing damages carried costs. The difference in the law as between the two countries was one that, in his opinion, ought no longer to exist; and he therefore proposed that the law of Ireland should be assimilated to that of England in this respect. He also proposed that unless a plaintiff obtained a verdict for damages amounting to £5 or upwards, he should not be entitled to more costs than damages. He had read cases in which Judges had refused to tell the jury what amount of damages would carry costs; but he thought it undesirable that this practice should be followed, because, although it was a legal fiction that all persons should be acquainted with the law, it was very seldom that juries could be found who possessed such legal knowledge; and he was glad to perceive that the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, in a recent case, had not followed the practice resorted to by other Judges, but had told the jury the amount of damages which would carry costs. At present, where only a shilling or even a farthing was recovered in the shape of damages, although the plaintiff did not get his costs, the defendant had to pay the expense he had incurred in defending the action. In his opinion the press ought to be protected against actions being brought by pettifogging attorneys for costs, or by parties who merely desired to gratify a malignant feeling. It was suggested to the Committee of the House of Lords that if substantial damages were not given to a plaintiff the defendant should not only be freed from the payment of the plaintiff's costs, but should have his own costs paid by the plaintiff. Mr. Johnson Gedge, the proprietor of The Bury Post, and other witnesses, had urged that the defendant should have his costs paid where the proceedings against him were shown by the verdict to have been vexatious or malicious. In the Bill he (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) brought in in 1865 he had proposed that where a plaintiff only obtained a verdict for 20s. damages, he should not only not be entitled to costs, but should pay the costs of the defendant, and he only gave the plaintiff costs where he recovered 40s. Since then he had found that there were several objections to the proposal that the plaintiff should pay the defendant's costs where he had recovered any amount of damages, and he now proposed to effect his object in a different way. His present proposition was that, as in other cases, the defendant in an action for libel should be at liberty to pay money into court; and if the jury considered the amount so paid into court sufficient to cover the injury, the defendant would be entitled to costs from the plaintiff. At present he could only do so under Lord Campbell's Act, where he pleaded a full and ample apology. The course he proposed was that in most actions in tort, and he thought it might be beneficially adopted in actions for libel. Furthermore, he proposed that where money was paid into court, and was not accepted by the plaintiff in discharge of his action, the plaintiff should not be allowed to proceed unless he gave security for costs; the newspaper proprietor who defended was already bound to give security to the Crown on the establishing of his paper, for any damages that might be awarded against him, and it would be no hardship to require the plaintiff to give a similar security. The third part of the Bill related to indictments or prosecutions for libel. At present there were three courses open to a party libelled: he could bring an action, he could file a criminal information in the Queen's Bench, or he could indict the publisher or writer of the libel. If an action were brought, the defendant stood on tolerably equal terms with the plaintiff: he could plead justification, could himself be examined as a witness, and, in case of obtaining a verdict, he could recover costs from the plaintiff. In the case of proceeding by criminal information no one could file such an information without leave of the court, so that there was a check against vindictiveness; but there was no check against procedure by indictment. In criminal information or indictment, moreover, the defendant stood in a very different position—he could not offer himself as a witness—his mouth was stopped, and though he might plead that what he had stated was true, and that the publication was for the public benefit, he could not be called in support of his plea, although very probably he was the only person able to establish it, course could be resorted to for purposes of oppression or to gratify malignant feelings. Again, where a man was indicted the Crown had power—though that power was now restrained by public opinion—to pack a jury; but the plaintiff in an indictment for libel could use this power, inasmuch as the prosecutor stood in the position of the Crown; and an instance in which the attempt to do this had been made had occurred in the sister country, but it drew from the present Chief Justice of Ireland, then Mr. Whiteside, so strong a remonstrance that the Judge interposed. The system was liable to the greatest possible abuse, as was exemplified in the case of Sir Robert Clifton, who had been summoned before police magistrates for a libel alleged to have been contained in a letter he had written; and in the case of the proprietors of The Railway Times and Chronicle, who were summoned to appear at Bow Street for having inserted in their paper letters reflecting on the management of the directors of the South Eastern Railway Company, those letters having been written by Mr. J. J. Hamilton, a shareholder in the company to the extent of £33,000. In Scotland the right of criminal prosecution in cases of libel practically did not exist, or had become obsolete. There was another inconvenience in the existing law, which was that a person indicting another for libel was not liable for costs himself, unless the defendant pleaded and proved, under Lord Campbell's Act, that what he had published was for the public benefit. He had originally proposed to do away with procedure by indictment in libel cases in this country; but on reflection he saw that cases might arise in which it would be desirable that a larger power of punishment than that of awarding damages should be retained; and his present proposition was therefore that no indictment for libel should be sent into court without the consent of the Attorney General, or, in case that office were vacant, of the Solicitor General. He also proposed that on a trial by indictment or information for libel, the defendant might offer himself as a witness. The fourth part of the Bill simply proposed a short form of pleading justification, so that the pitfalls which were at present due to the technicalities of the law might be avoided. But in order that the plaintiff might not be injured by the use of a plea which might be regarded as of too general a nature, he proposed to give him power to require a bill of particulars. Furthermore, he proposed that the Bill should not extend to Scotland. In conclusion, he had only to say that in his opinion the best protection against the licence of the press would be found in having the press conducted by respectable persons, and anything which tended to expose the proprietors of newspapers to needless and vexatious proceedings was calculated to discourage such persons from retaining their connection with the press. He was not prepared to say that every provision in the Bill ought to receive the sanction of the House, but he was perfectly willing to have it amended in Committee.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Colman O'Loghlen.)

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: I do not rise to offer any opposition whatever to the second reading of this Bill. After hearing the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman I think that it will be in many respects a highly beneficial Act if it passes: but there are several matters in it which will require care and consideration, either before a Select Committee or in Committee of this House, because I think it will be found that there are very great powers given to the press by the Bill, and it is a question whether those powers are not larger than the hon. and learned Member intended. Let me call attention for a moment to the case that was mentioned by the hon. and learned Gentleman, that of "Davison v. Duncan," which was decided against The Durham Advertiser, for commenting on the proceedings of the West Hartlepool Commissioners. The decision in that case was the occasion of Lord Campbell's Bill in 1858. That Bill, which was in some respects similar to that now before the

Sir Colman O'Loghlen

House, but differing from it in some material particulars, was thrown out on the second reading by the House of Lords, in consequence of the difficulties felt by some noble Lords as to the extent to which the privileges of the press ought to be carried. In commenting on the case of "Davison v. Duncan" Lord Campbell said—

"The inconvenience arising from the chance of the injury to private character is infinitesimally small as compared to the convenience of publicity. But it has never yet been contended that such a privilege extends to a report of what takes place at all public meetings. Even if confined to a report of what was relevant to the object of the meeting, it would extend the privilege to an alarming extent. If this plea is good, a fair amount of what takes place may be published, whatever harm the publication may do to private character, provided it took place at a meeting of a public nature—a wide description, embracing all kinds of meetings, from a county meeting to a parish meeting."

Those were the observations made by Lord Chief Justice Campbell in the case referred to; and I would ask the hon. and learned Member—not for the purpose of impeding the progress of his Bill, but in order to prevent its being wrecked either here or elsewhere—that some more careful definition of a public meeting than that contained in the 1st clause should be hereafter framed. I find the definition of a public meeting in the 1st clause is "any public meeting lawfully assembled for a lawful purpose." That, in the words of Lord Campbell, is extending the liberty in a rather alarming degree, more especially since, as was pointed out by Lord Lyndhurst in the debate on the Bill in the Upper House, in a great many cases people go to a public meeting for the purpose of uttering slander. And although under the 2nd clause these persons are made liable for any injury done to the person slandered, yet they are frequently persons against whom it is useless to bring any action at all, and the real injury is done by the circulation of the slander in the newspapers. So far, however, as I have been able to give attention to the Bill and to the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman, I think that the second clause will work extremely well. It has been urged that slander and libel are not by the law put upon the same ground—that the person uttering slander usually does so in the heat of the moment, and that the effect is fleeting; while the words used in a libel deliberately published are intentionally used, and are of a very different character from words used in the heat of the moment. I cannot, however, help thinking that the observation made by Lord Lyndhurst in the debate in the House of Lords is perfectly true—that a man who goes to a public meeting to make a statement makes it with a deliberate intention, and with a full knowledge of what it comprehends. I cannot see, however, why that man should not be liable to an action, or to any other proceeding for libel, just as if he had published the libel, and circulated it. I will not detain the House by going through the different clauses of the Bill; but that which refers to paying money into court I think will be fair and useful. I would suggest, however, that in Clause 6, providing that unless the jury shall give damages exceeding £5 the plaintiff shall not be entitled to more costs than damages, it would be well to add words to the effect—"Except the Judge should think that the action was one which ought to have been brought, and that costs ought to be awarded." With regard to the practice of some of the Judges in declaring what amount of damages carry costs, it differs in various Courts; but I cannot help thinking that it would not be inconvenient if the jury always knew what damages would carry costs. I cannot quite agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman that everyone is expected to know the law, although there is an old legal maxim that ignorance of the law is no excuse. I recollect that a very learned Judge, Mr. Justice Maule, who is now dead, said that if it were supposed that every one was acquainted with the law the Judges of the land were exceptions; because in a writ of error it was always set forth that there were manifest errors in the judgment. The clause requiring that no prosecution for a libel shall be brought except with the sanction of the Attorney General will also require to be considered in Committee. I do not think that my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General would shrink from performing a public duty; but this difficulty must arise, that a case would go before the jury with a certain amount of sanction to the prosecution if the Attorney General had given his consent to its institution; and, in the next place, the clause was open to the objection that it would not be easy, without some proper machinery being provided, to enable him to do so, for the Attorney General to determine accurately whether the case is one in which there ought to be a prosecution. The 8th clause of the Bill, which enables a defendant at the trial of an indictment or information for libel to offer himself or herself as a witness, and also enables the husband or wife of a defendant to be examined, has my unqualified approbation. Since the passing of the Common Law Procedure Act the practice has prevailed under its sanction of pleading generally in actions of libel that the alleged libel is true; but any difficulty arising from this is removed by the provision that a bill of particulars of what is intended to be relied upon by the defendant shall be given in all cases where it is desirable it should be given. With regard to the clause in which it is proposed that security for costs should be given by the plaintiff, I did not quite follow the hon. and learned Gentleman's reasoning; but it appears to me that all the parties ought to be put upon the same footing in that respect. I have made these remarks in order that they may receive the hon. and learned Member's consideration, and not with any view of opposing the second reading.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, the Bill had been introduced as a Bill in the first instance to promote the freedom of the press. It was the practice of hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, the hon. Member for Leeds especially was wont to laud the press of this country, and to compare the cheap press with that of the United States, drawing a just comparison in favour of the higher tone that prevailed in the cheap press of England. Now, if under the present state of the law the public press of the country was marked by a high tone, he thought that the House would not lightly regard any proposal to alter the law under which that press existed. The hon. and learned Member (Sir Colman O'Loughlen) had laid great stress upon the injustice of leaving the proprietors of newspapers liable to be prosecuted for defamation; but the probability was, that the responsibility which at present attached to the proprietors had done much to create the present high tone of English journals. The man who undertook a risk under securities for his good conduct was likely to be a man of higher character and position than a person placed under no such moral and practical restraint. This Bill, in the first instance, purported to widen the freedom of the press; but how would it affect the freedom of individuals? One peculiarity of our legislation of late years had been that it had enormously increased the liberty and power of associations, but it had done very little for individual freedom. Formerly from the other side of the House proceeded eloquent vindications of individual freedom; but now they heard nothing from that quarter but appeals for the extension of the freedom and power of associations. The hon. and learned Gentleman proposed that individuals who made statements at public meetings which might be supposed to be slanderous or libellous should be liable—for what? Not for the words spoken by them, but for words reported. He was happy to say that reliance could generally be placed on the accuracy of the reports of the speeches which were delivered in that House, and of what was said out of it; but then it must be remembered that reporting was at present under the restraint that operated on the proprietors of newspapers. A reporter must be a highly educated man, and it was well known that many of them were persons of the highest possible attainments, and some of them were members of the legal profession. Reporters were better judges of what constituted a libel than a person who spoke under excitement at a public meeting. When a man uttered a libel in the heat of discussion at a public meeting there existed the means of correction, for the statement might be immediately contradicted;—the slander might be answered on the spot; and he had known many instances in which that had taken place, even where the meeting was notoriously packed. But how did the grievance arise? Why, by the publication of the report; because the report reached the public far beyond the meeting at which the slander was uttered. The grievance was therefore far more in the publication than in the utterance of the slander? It might be almost impossible for the person libelled to reach the author of a slander, if the publisher of it was to have perfect indemnity. No man valued the freedom of the press more sincerely than he did, but he saw danger in the proposed alteration. We had a press which deserved all the encomiums that had been passed upon it; but there was a difference between freedom and licence, and if they removed all responsibility on the part of the publisher, in his opinion they would open the door to a class of newspaper proprietors lower than the present. They might depend upon it, that freedom was not an accident, but a privilege which could only exist by being preserved within due restraints. He loved freedom. Tory he was; no one could show him the occasion on which he did not defend freedom. But they should not forget that freedom—that liberty generally perished by its own excess. Therefore was it that he looked with much suspicion on the principle of this Bill, and trusted that if the Bill passed a second reading that it would be referred to a Select Committee; or that else the Committee of that House would thoroughly investigate and consider the various principles contained in it, so that whilst endeavouring to extend, they might not destroy, the freedom of the press. It would be difficult to preserve individuals from abuse that might arise from the licence of the press, if there was no law to prevent the conductors of newspapers from putting reports into the mouths of speakers which were totally inaccurate. That reporters should be perfectly accurate was impossible. It would, therefore, be a great hardship that any speaker should be liable to an action for a false report. A free press was one of the most powerful instruments for preserving individual and collective freedom; but, if it were under restraint or in the hands of a Government, it might be a most effective means of tyranny. He (Mr. Newdegate) looked with the greatest suspicion on the clause which proposed that a Government officer should decide whether an indictment would lie or not, instead of that primary act of jurisdiction being left to the proper tribunals of the country. Let them look across the Channel, and take warning from the position of the press in France and in Spain. In those countries the press was used against the people. They could not be too careful of the manner in which they dealt with the law which wholesomely regulated the press, whilst at the same time it preserved its liberty, lest both the law and the press should degenerate from their high tone and character. He had spoken strongly; but he objected to the principle of the measure, on the ground, first, that he saw in it danger to the freedom of discussion; secondly, to the freedom of individuals; and ultimately, he feared, by encouraging excess, to the freedom of the press itself.

Mr. Newdegate

MR. BUXTON said, there were two evils which the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Warwickshire chiefly appeared to dread ; but these were carefully provided against by the Bill. The first was, that libels might be put into the mouths of speakers by the reporters ; but the Bill declared that unless the report was a faithful one the paper publishing it should not be protected. Again, that hon. Member said that if a man uttered slander at a public meeting another speaker might get up and answer him, but the libel would still be published in the newspaper. Well, the same protection was afforded by the Bill in the case of a libellous report, because it expressly required that the answer sent to the editor by the person aggrieved must be inserted in the newspaper in which the report had appeared. The hon. Gentleman had told them to look at the press of France and Spain, and certainly the more they looked at it the less they liked it ; but what had happened in those countries did not, he thought, justify them in placing our own press under oppressive restrictions.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS agreed with the hon. Member for North Warwickshire in thinking that the utmost care was required in dealing with this subject. There was no conceivable engine capable of being employed for the purpose of inflicting wrong on private character comparable in power to the press, and its power had for many years been increasing in a geometrical ratio by reason of the immense multiplication both of newspapers and of their readers. At a public meeting a man might, in the heat of debate, say something which it would have been better to leave unsaid, but it passed away like breath in a moment, and the wound was soon healed—if, indeed, any wound was given at all, for the person concerned might not be present. But the mischief done by those fleeting words, evanescent as it would probably be, was made permanent when they were circulated far and wide by a newspaper published and sold for a profit. Before they removed the present restraints it was necessary first to prove there was a grievance. He did not think that it had been proved that there was. He agreed in all the compliments that had been paid to the press ; he would bear personal testimony to the admirable manner in which, as a rule, the press of this country was conducted ; but it was worthy of consideration whether its high tone was not due—partly at least—to the wholesome restraints of our law, and whether it was desirable to relax those restraints upon so formidable an instrument both of good and of evil, merely because some newspaper proprietor, who was generally a rich man, might now and then be brought into a court by some not very worthy individual to answer for an alleged libel. Let them diminish the securities under which the freedom of the press was exercised and they would open a door, which they might not afterwards be able to close again, to dangerous excesses. He did not know whether the representatives of the press generally complained of any grievance in this matter, or whether they had petitioned that House to relieve them from any alleged unjust or oppressive operation of the present law. If that were so, no doubt the question should be brought before the Legislature. But the first part of this Bill required the gravest consideration, depriving a man, as it did, of the right to sue for the redress of a wrong done to his reputation, which was, in most cases, a far greater injury than an assault upon his person. The provisions of the second part of the Bill were, he thought, excellent. As to the third part, he agreed with the Solicitor General that it ought not to depend on the will of a Government officer whether or not one man should be entitled to indict another for libel. Supposing one person published a gross libel on the character of another in order to extort money. [An hon. MEMBER : That case is excepted from the measure.] He was glad that it was excepted ; but there were many other motives for publishing gross libels equally wicked, and he could not see why a man should not have as free a remedy in a court of justice where his reputation was assailed as he had when violence was offered to his person.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that it appeared that no one had any objection to fix the liability for a slander uttered at a public meeting upon the speaker ; but great objection was entertained to relieving from responsibility the proprietor of a newspaper in which it might be reported. Whatever the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) said, he said in so solemn a manner that they became alarmed ; the bias of their minds was disturbed by the solemnity of his utterances. Let them, however, look at this question like men who were not terrified out of their wits. Who was most likely to bring an action against a newspaper ? Was it the honest man ? Certainly not.

An honest man against whom a libel had been published would go to the proprietor of the journal in which it had appeared, and say, "I have been libelled. Give me the opportunity of stating the facts of the case;" and if the newspaper refused to publish his answer, it would still, under this Bill, be liable; but if it inserted the answer, and afforded the person libelled the means of defending himself, it would not be liable. But what did the dishonest man do? He rushed to an attorney, who at once wrote to the proprietor of the paper for the name of his solicitor, in order that he might serve process, and, without asking for any explanation or contradiction of the false statement, immediately commenced proceedings. If the newspaper proprietor offered to insert an apology, the pettifogging attorney would say that that was not the time; they must wait. The meaning of this was, that they were to wait until costs had been incurred, otherwise, he would get no pickings, no fees, no bill. When, however, the matter came on for trial, he was "quite open to an arrangement." That meant that the poor unfortunate newspaper proprietor should make an arrangement by which he should pay all the costs. What possible harm could happen to society from the passing of this Bill? That was the real question for the House to consider. He had heard a great many platitudes uttered in laudation of the press, and he could not altogether acquit the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Thomas Chambers) of having uttered some against it. The hon. and learned Gentleman had talked about its terrible power. What was the meaning of that? Why, it meant a terrible good. Then the hon. and learned Gentleman said that publications had enormously increased, and not only that, but so also had their readers. What did that imply but that the greatest possible advantage was derived by the public from the press? In the very remarkable evidence given by the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) before the Committee of the House of Lords on that subject, there was an enumeration of the various classes of public bodies the proceedings of which the newspapers were accustomed to report. There were—"1, both Houses of Parliament; 2, Courts of Law and police courts; 3, municipal corporations, and bodies of commissioners for objects of local administration, protection, and improvement; 4, Poor Law guardians; 5, vestry meetings; 6, Parliamentary, municipal, and other elections; 7, meetings of magistrates for county and other business; 8, county, borough, or parish meetings convened by sheriffs, mayors, or other authorities; 9, meetings of public charities, or institutions benevolent, educational, reformatory, and religious; 10, public meetings to promote political, legal, and social reforms; 11, meetings of mechanics' institutions, and philosophical societies, the Society of Arts; 12, public lectures like those on the supply of cotton, adulteration of food, &c.; 13, meetings of railway proprietors; 14, meetings of banks, and other joint-stock companies; meetings of Chambers of Commerce." Was there not immense advantage to the public in the reporting of these meetings? And how was it done? It was done by reporters, whom the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) himself admitted must be educated men, and whose only desire was to give faithful reports of what took place. These reports the editor of a daily paper had no time to revise. He must therefore either exclude all accounts of such proceedings, or run the risk that in some rare instances the malignity of some individual might do injustice to the character of another. But, even if such a thing occurred, the very weapon that inflicted the wound healed it the day after the slander had appeared—the very journal which had circulated would give equal publicity to its contradiction, and therefore no mischief was done to an honest man. Under these circumstances, the House would not have much difficulty in assenting to the second reading of this Bill. When the Bill got into Committee, every clause ought to be carefully considered; but the measure was not one to be referred to a Select Committee. Did the hon. Member for North Warwickshire think that was the first time that that question had been considered? Why, it had long been under consideration, he might almost say for centuries; all their great writers had given their opinion upon the matter, and it was now ripe for decision. The House should decide it on its own responsibility, and when it had done so he thought they need fear no danger to society.

Mr. Roebuck

MR. BAINES said, it seemed to him that that was a case in which there was a claim the most irresistible for plain justice to the most important institution of this land—namely, the press. Gentlemen connected with the press were now liable to heavy punishment for not doing that which it was notoriously impossible that they should do—that was to say, for not examining reports, often brought in at the last moment before publication, in order to eliminate from them whatever might be defamatory. It was said that slander ought to be punished. He admitted it; but who was the slanderer? The hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Thomas Chambers) argued that it was not the utterance by the voice that did the mischief, but its publication in the newspapers. He said No: the man who first uttered it first published it to the world. It was true a report of what was said was printed, perhaps on the following day; but one very important consideration must be borne in mind—namely, the effect produced upon what was said at a public meeting by the known fact that the speeches to be delivered there would be published. The man who uttered a speech knew that it would go to all the world, and he therefore measured, regulated, and moderated the statements which he made. But that was not all. It was quite possible that a libellous statement uttered at a public meeting might be distorted and magnified to such a degree as to do infinitely more harm than if the actual words were given. But the following day the actual words were known. Then the man who had been libelled came forward, sent a statement for the correction of that libel to the newspaper, that statement was inserted, and thereby the evil that had been done was redressed. Without the newspaper they could not have that, because that which had gone forth on the wings of rumour they could not identify or refute; but when it appeared in the press, they could ascertain what it was and refute it. The proceedings of public meetings, then, were immensely modified and improved by the knowledge that they would be published to the world, and by the fact that they were published by men who had no malice, and no other interest in the matter except to give correctly to the world what was said. Those men were not the guilty parties. The Legislature chose to punish, not the man who uttered the slander, but the man who published it. That reminded him of the ancient Persian law under which great persons were not punished, save by proxy, for their errors. Cyrus was too great to be punished, and therefore they had whipping boys as deputies. The condition of the proposed exemption—namely, that the newspaper should be required to publish a refutation of the libel which it might have been the innocent means of circulating—the proprietors of newspapers were willing to accept. He believed that many proprietors of the provincial press had petitioned for the adoption of a measure like the present; and he was glad to find, from the very liberal speech made that day by the Solicitor General, that there was now every prospect of an absurd and unjust state of the law relating to the press being at length remedied.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that as the House seemed willing to accord a second reading to the Bill, he would not make any remarks on the principle of the measure. But there was a point of some importance raised by the learned Solicitor General on which they ought to have some clear understanding. That hon. and learned Gentleman said that, although prepared to give newspaper proprietors an immunity from prosecution in certain cases, he thought it would be necessary to define very carefully those public meetings in regard to the speeches delivered at which the proprietors of newspapers should enjoy an immunity for the publication of faithful though slanderous reports. Now, for himself, he believed it would be found extremely difficult to have any other definition than that contained in the first clause of that Bill—namely, that the exemption from liability should extend to the reports of all speeches at all public meetings lawfully assembled for a lawful purpose. He spoke with the more confidence on that subject because, when the matter was brought some time since before the House of Lords, a clause was introduced into the late Lord Campbell's Bill laying down precisely what were the kind of meetings the reports of which should be privileged. Lord Lyndhurst objected to the definition then proposed, and actually suggested the very words used in the present Bill—namely, "any public meeting lawfully assembled for a lawful purpose." That definition seemed to be accepted at the time as the best that could be devised if the thing was to be done at all.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, he entirely concurred in the part of the Bill which brought slanderous expressions used at public meetings within the law of libel. At present what a man said against the character of his neighbour at a public meeting was actionable only if it came within the law of slander, which was of a very narrow description ; but if he said anything which, if written, would be actionable, but which was not actionable if spoken, he was entirely exempt from responsibility. That was a great abuse, because the man who spoke slanderous words knew perfectly well that there were other persons present who were writing them down. Therefore, as he spoke the words knowing that they were going to be published, he ought to be liable the same as if he wrote them with his own hand. But he (Sir George Bowyer) felt considerable doubt whether a paper publishing slander ought, in every case, to be exempt from responsibility. The editor of a respectable paper not only ought to, but did exercise, he believed, a certain discrimination in publishing the reports of speeches, and if he saw anything in a speech that was decidedly of a slanderous nature, and which ought not to be published, it was his duty to hold his hand, to take care what he did about it, and refrain from publishing attacks upon private character. It might be said there was no occasion to make the newspaper editor or proprietor liable, because the remedy ought to be against the person who uttered the words at the meeting. But the injured person might not always be able to find the actual utterer of the slanderous words, even though his name might be given in the newspaper. Under those circumstances, the remedy against the man who spoke a slander might be, in many cases, insufficient. Even if he were discovered, he might be found to be "a man of straw," against whom it would be absurd to bring an action, inasmuch as he would be unable to pay damages in the event of the verdict being against him. But then it was said that the proper remedy for an honest man to have recourse to was to apply to the editor of the newspaper in which the slander was published, and to call upon him to contradict it. It must, however, be borne in mind that a great many persons might read the slander who might never see the contradiction, and who, even if they did see it, would not be disposed to attach to it much importance. Besides, people would rather read a slander than a refutation. It was once said by a witty French writer—he believed Madame De Sevigné—that some person to whom reference was made had so little credit for telling the truth that no one would believe him even though he were to speak ill of his neighbour. It was clear that slander was a thing which found very ready acceptance ; and he (Sir George Bowyer) was afraid that in the cases in which contradictions were published in a newspaper, there would be some persons who would not look upon the denial as a sufficient proof that the slander was without foundation. He therefore was of opinion that it was right the proprietors of newspapers should be placed under some sort of restraint with regard to the publication of matter tending to involve private character, and that they ought not to be absolved from all responsibility for such publication, even though the slander were originally uttered by a speaker at a public meeting. That, however, was a point which could be discussed in Committee, and he hoped it would receive due consideration, for the publishers of newspapers wielded such enormous powers that it would lead, he was afraid, to great inconvenience if they were to receive the complete immunity which was proposed.

Sir George Bowyer

MR. SYNAN said, that newspapers were under a necessity to report the proceedings of public meetings lawfully constituted, and they were therefore, he thought, entitled to some protection. Freedom of the press in this country was not, as had been advanced, a matter of privilege, but a matter of right.

MR. HENLEY said, that as at present advised, he could see no objection to the 1st clause of the Bill, which exempted, under the conditions stated, accurate reports of public meetings. Upon the 2nd clause he should withhold judgment, as he was not at present disposed to assent to making words spoken subject to the law of libel. That clause required serious consideration, as they all knew the great difficulty of proving the exact words uttered, and the temper and tone in which they were uttered. They also knew something about standing on public hustings. Strong language was there used sometimes. Was a man who used strong language on the hustings to be liable to an action for libel ? That part of the Bill, however, could be dealt with in Committee, although he confessed that at present he did not like the clause. To extend the law to words spoken was taking a great step, and he believed that on the whole it would lead to more inconvenience than the contrary. He saw no harm in absolving the press if the answer to the libel appeared in the same part of the paper. It was an immense advantage to have everything published, and they might go a little out of their way to relieve those who were at the expense of publishing from penal consequences.

MR. WALPOLE rose merely, in consequence of the observations of his right hon. Friend and of the learned Solicitor General, to suggest the advisability, in order that the wording of the two clauses referred to might be put into the best shape for discussion in Committee, that after the second reading of the Bill it should be referred to a Select Committee, where the clauses could be better dealt with.

SIR COLMAN O'LOGHLEN agreed that it would be better to remit the consideration of these clauses to a Select Committee at once.

Bill read a second time, and committed to a Select Committee.

And, on March 20, Select Committee nominated as follows:—Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL, Mr. MILNER GIBSON, Sir ROBERT COLLIER, Viscount AMBERLEY, Mr. HENLEY, Mr. LOWE, Mr. LAWSON, Mr. ROEBUCK, Mr. SANDFORD, Captain GRIDLEY, Mr. SULLIVAN, Mr. BAINES, and Sir COLMAN O'LOGHLEN:—Five to be the quorum.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (IRELAND) BILL. (The O'Conor Don, Mr. Monsell, Mr. Leatham.)

[BILL 17.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The O'Conor Don.)

MR. PEEL DAWSON, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said, he thought the measure was an unwise and inopportune proposal for extending the Reformatory Schools Act, and ought to be regarded with a just sense of suspicion and distrust, because it would have the effect of encouraging sectarian education in Ireland, which it had been the avowed policy of Parliament for the last thirty-five years, and of every successive Government during that period, to restrain and discourage, so far, at least, as assistance from the public purse was concerned. He regarded this Bill as an underhand attack on the national system of education in Ireland, which, though it had many faults, had been the means of diffusing a better system of education throughout the country than any other system was likely to attain. It behoved Parliament, therefore, to take care that no underhand blows should be dealt against it. It might be in the recollection of the House that in 1861 a very similar measure to this was introduced by the hon. Gentleman who now represented the city of Cork (Mr. Maguire); but with this difference—that whereas in that Bill the charge for supporting the schools was laid on the poor rates, by the present Bill it was transferred to the county cess. He (Mr. Peel Dawson) felt it his duty to give that Bill his opposition; and it met with so little favour from the House that it did not receive a second reading. Under its operation the fourteenth provision of the English Act would be extended to the sister country, and therefore any children under the age of fourteen who might be found begging might be clothed, fed, and educated at the public cost. No better mode, he maintained, of holding out a premium to vagrancy than the establishment of such a system could well be devised. It would also furnish a dangerous temptation to parents to repudiate all responsibility in the care and nurture of their children by making a declaration simply before a magistrate that they were unable to control them. He could discover no security against the uncontrolled expenditure of public money. The Bill was all the more untimely, in his opinion, because the late and present Chancellor of the Exchequer had promised that the educational expenses in unions, and the salaries of teachers should henceforward, as in England, be made a charge on the Consolidated Fund. He objected to having such a measure pressed to a second reading in the unavoidable absence of the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the Irish Law Officers. He learnt from a petition which had been presented to that House, that instead of paying 15*d.* a week for a pauper child, as at present in most unions, the county charge, if the Bill passed, would be raised to 5*s.* a week for every child who might be kidnapped into the proposed schools in certain parts of Ireland. He doubted not that most of the unions in Ireland would declare their opposition to this measure. He feared that the provisions of this Bill would be made use of for purposes of proselytism, and he could not assent to a Bill which, in his opinion, would tend to such a breach of the principles of Christian charity. The adoption of this Bill would increase and aggravate the disputes which were continually going on, and which caused so much rancour among ministers of the different religious sections in Ireland, especially in reference to foundlings and the offspring of mixed marriages. The difference between the relation of the religious bodies in Ireland and in England prevented a fair analogy being drawn between them. He contended, moreover, that Ireland was already overschooled, and that no sufficient time had elapsed for testing the principles that had been applied in the same direction in England. The feeling of the Protestants of the North of Ireland was opposed to this measure, and such opinions were entitled to receive the attention and consideration of the House, and the Presbyterian Church there wholly protested against it. He had received a letter from an eminent professor in the Presbyterian College at Londonderry, in which he said that the establishment of this system in Ireland would bring about an educational revolution; that the design of its promoters was to substitute sectarian for united education, and to obtain greatly increased endowments for the promotion of the sectarian system; and he remarked that the Irish system of education differed entirely from the English, and that it was not advisable to follow up the English precedent. Resolutions were also passed at a meeting of ministers in the synod of Omagh, County Tyrone, in opposition to this attempt to further sectarian education, which it was contended would entirely supersede the national system in Ireland, and which was calculated to cause alarm to the taxpayers of the country. He agreed in the opinions thus expressed, and foresaw that if this Bill were passed into a law it would be turned into an instrument of religious discord and of possible proselytism.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Peel Dawson.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN said, that as it had fallen to his lot to prepare and introduce the English Reformatory and Industrial School Bills last year, which were adopted by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walpole) and subsequently became law, he wished to say a few words upon the subject. The non-extension to Ireland of those Bills had not arisen from any doubt on the part of the late Government that the principles which had proved so beneficial to England were equally applicable to the sister country. But the Irish Reformatory Act had been passed subsequently to the first English Act, and was a separate measure with some separate provisions, and it was thought better, in the first place, still to keep the Acts separate, and, in the second place, as it was positively necessary to renew the English Industrial Act which was about to expire, it was deemed better to introduce as little as possible that might give rise to controversy, and possibly delay the passing of that Act, introduced as it was, of necessity, at a late period of the Session. From the speech of his hon. Friend opposite, the House would imagine that the Irish Reformatory Act must have already proved injurious to the system of National Education in Ireland. But what was the real state of the case? That Act was passed in 1858. He believed there were now nine Reformatories in Ireland. But since the date of that Act the National schools in Ireland had increased more than 1,000 in number, and the number of children on the school-rolls had increased more than 300,000. At the close of the year 1865, there were 6,372 schools in operation, with upwards of 900,000 children on the rolls, and an average daily attendance of more than 320,000. How could any one say that the reformatories have injured the system of National Education? But if this was not the case, what evil was likely to result from the extension to Ireland of the Industrial Act? This Act was for the prevention, as the reformatory was for the cure, of juvenile crime. The classes of children to be dealt with under the Act were these (with a limit as to age)—1, children accused of an offence punishable with imprisonment, who have not been previously convicted of felony; 2, children found begging in the street; 3, children without home or proper guardianship; 4, refractory children in workhouses; 5, children whose parents represent that they are unable to control them. Now, what percentage of the 900,000 children on the rolls of the Irish National Schools did his hon. Friend think would come under any of these denominations? The truth was that the reformatory and industrial schools aimed at a class of children different from that which supplied the National schools; they were children who would not be reached at all without these schools. No doubt there were difficulties in the system—there always must be difficulties where you engraft State assistance upon voluntary management—but the good far preponderated over the evil. With respect to the objection that the Bill was proceeded with in the absence of the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Lord Naas), he could only say that if his memory served him right, that noble Lord had expressed his approval of the Reformatory Act when it was introduced, and there was no reason to doubt his approval of the present Bill. He (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) had heard with much pain the observations of his hon. Friend opposite, upon the subject of proselytism. Why make it a question whether these unfortunate children should be educated as Protestants or Catholics, when the real question was, whether they should be educated at all? Besides, whenever the question of the Established Church in Ireland was mooted—a question upon which the House would probably hear a great deal more before long—we were always told that although the great majority of the Irish people were Roman Catholics, the vast proportion of the property in Ireland belonged to Protestants. If that was the case, were they to suppose that Protestants were so dead to the interests of their religion, that they would not provide Protestant industrial schools, rather than suffer the Roman Catholics to possess a monopoly of these institutions? For his own part, he confessed that he did not envy the man who would refuse to allow these children to be taught morality, for fear that morality should be inculcated by teachers of a creed differing from his own. It would be a happy day for Ireland when Roman Catholics and Protestants should learn to march forward on their own way, without continually seeking to jostle one another upon the road. But until that happy day arrived, at least do not let the House choose such a question as this for the battle-field of religious differences—a question of rescuing the outcasts of society from sin, misery, and degradation, was surely a question of all others upon which men of all creeds might forget their differences, and endeavour to meet and to agree to act together upon the grounds of common patriotism and common humanity.

Mr. Peel Dawson

MR. DUNLOP said, that when he had attempted to pass a Bill for the establishment of the industrial school system in Scotland, he was met by the most determined opposition on the part of the Members from Ireland, who expressed fear lest, under his measure, Roman Catholic children might be proselytized. He was therefore delighted to find that many Irish Members seemed at length to appreciate the real value of the industrial school system, and were now desirous of having it applied to Ireland. He could assure his hon. Friends that in Scotland they had found that the dangers which were apprehended from adopting a system of this kind were only visionary. Under these circumstances he should cordially support the Bill, though he would not have done so if he had thought that the national system would be endangered by it. He had, however, no apprehension that this would be so. The class for which the Bill was intended was a very limited and a very peculiar class, and the peculiarity of the class was the great reason for providing that the education given should be sectarian. In schools of this kind a great deal depended upon having managers whose hearts were in the work, and they could hardly hope to obtain this amount of interest unless the schools were sectarian. While supporting the Bill, however, he thought that some improvement might be made in the details; and in particular, he thought that the same securities should be given against proselytising Protestant children in Ireland as were given in reference to Roman Catholic children in England.

MR. SYNAN said, he was at a loss to comprehend the grounds on which the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Peel Dawson) opposed the Bill, as the national system in Ireland did not provide for that class of children for whose sake industrial schools were sought to be established. The industrial school system had operated most beneficially in England, and he desired to see its benefits extended to Ireland. As to the statements that the Bill would promote vagrancy and proselytism, he thought a decisive refutation was given to those assertions by the provisions of the Bill; because the grand juries, the proprietors of Ireland, were to be the parties to grant money for the establishment of these schools, and they were certainly not likely to tax themselves to promote vagrancy and proselytism. He believed that the Bill, instead of encouraging vagrancy, struck at its root; because, by enabling a mass of vagrant children to receive an industrial education, it provided the means of making them industrious citizens.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, that no one who had spoken in favour of the Bill had attempted to show that there existed any public necessity for taxing the Irish cesspayers for the purposes contemplated by the measure before the House. He had been for over twenty years the chairman of the Board of a large union in Ireland, and was acquainted with all classes there, religious and political, and he could truly say that not one single person had addressed one line or word to him in favour of the present Bill. In order to ascertain what amount of sympathy was excited by the measure, he had made inquiries as to the number of petitions presented in reference to the Bill, and he found that there had been only one petition, signed by two persons, presented on the subject, and that petition was against the Bill. The measure would establish a new and very costly system of education in Ireland, and how was it to be paid for? It was to be paid for out of the county cess, which affected the pockets of all the poorer classes in Ireland. The promoters of the Bill had failed to show that the existing system in Ireland had failed to meet the evil for which a new system was now alleged to be necessary. In all the poorhouses in Ireland there were industrial schools; and he had known numbers of instances of young men and women who, after acquiring a knowledge in the poorhouse of some industrial occupation, had earned enough afterwards not only to keep themselves, but to enable them to withdraw their brothers and sisters from the house. Let them show him that there was a class of juvenile vagrants in Ireland requiring industrial schools, and he was open to conviction. It was very easy to point to the system in England; but he was happy to say that they were not horrified in Ireland by that mass of juvenile crime which was concomitant with the accumulation of wealth in this country. He felt that he was only doing his duty in supporting the Motion for the rejection of the measure, and in so acting he was not influenced by any desire to prevent industrial education in Ireland; but did so because he thought the effect of the Bill would be greatly to mar the operation of the existing system of education, and to sap the principle of self-reliance by offering an inducement to many parents to drive their children into vagrancy and crime in order to make them qualified to obtain a first-rate education at the public expense.

MR. LAWSON said, he believed that the Bill would confer a very great boon on Ireland. It proposed to deal with children of the vagrant class, and to place them in schools—extending to Ireland the system which prevailed in England. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Peel Dawson), had put forward the extraordinary proposition that Ireland was already overschooled; but, in answer to the objection urged on such a score, it was only necessary to state that it rested entirely in the option of the grand juries to grant or withhold money for the establishment of the industrial schools. The noble Lord the Member for Tyrone (Lord Claud Hamilton) asserted that there existed no necessity for such legislation. If that be so, and if in the county which the noble Lord represented the people were perfectly satisfied with the existing machinery at work there, it was extremely probable that the grand juries of that county would not put the machinery of the present Bill in motion: but what reason was there why the grand juries in other counties, where things were not in so satisfactory a state in respect to proper provision for vagrant children, should not be intrusted with the power which it was proposed to give them by the present Bill? He found it difficult to understand the argument that the industrial school system would interfere with the system of National education in Ireland, for the latter system was voluntary. No child could be sent to the National schools without the consent of the parents, and the schools were day-schools, so that the children returned to their parents every day. The industrial schools, on the other hand, would take in children having no protection, and train them up in the principles of religion and morality. This object could not be attained except by the establishment of schools to be conducted according to the religious faith of the children, like the reformatory schools, which were working so well in Ireland. He had no doubt that the pockets of the cesspayers, which the noble Lord the Member for Tyrone was so anxious to protect, would be properly protected by the grand juries, and he gave the Bill his hearty support.

Lord Claud Hamilton

SIR HERVEY BRUCE said, he did not concur with the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Peel Dawson) that the national system of education in Ireland rendered these industrial schools unnecessary; because the first and great principle of the system was that children of all denominations should be simply instructed in secular knowledge, scrupulously declining to enter into the religious element at all. His own opinion rather was that if we took these children from the streets it was due to them to see that they were provided not only with secular education, but also with religious education according to the religion of their parents. He thought the gravest and most serious objection to the Bill was the proposal to charge the people of Ireland for the schools to be established. He held that it was very unfair to charge the poorest classes of the Irish people with the education and training of these outcast children, and that the expense should not be taken out of the local funds. If he understood the hon Member who introduced the measure, the provisions of his Bill would differ from those of the English Industrial Act in a very important particular. That Act provided that the national funds should pay 2s. 6d. per week for the support of such children; but he saw no clause in the Bill providing that some such contribution should be given by the State towards the support of these children in Ireland. It had been said that Ireland was overschooled, but he did not think so; though he believed that the education pursued in the model schools was not applicable at the present moment to the wants of the people of Ireland, and much of the money expended on them might be employed for the maintenance of the schools contemplated by the present Bill. The whole expense was to be provided out of the county cess. That was, in his estimation, very objectionable. Independent of any other objections to the Bill, he thought it was brought forward at a very unseasonable time. Owing to the disturbances in Ireland many hon. Members, and most of the Irish Members of the Government, were absent, and it was unfortunate that a measure in which they were deeply interested should be prosecuted in their absence. He thought it would only be showing befitting courtesy to the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland and the other Irish Members of the Government to delay the further consideration of the Bill. If the hon. Gentleman the Member for Roscommon (The O'Connor Don) would promise not to ask the House to go into Committee upon the Bill until the Chief Secretary and other Irish Members had returned to their places, he would not object to the second reading.

THE O'CONNOR DON said, that he had not imagined that any opposition would be offered to the second reading of this Bill, because it was merely a proposal to extend to Ireland the benefits of the Act passed last Session for Great Britain. He heard, however, with great surprise the intention of his hon. Friend opposite to oppose the second reading; but did not believe that it was necessary for him to say anything until he had heard the reasons assigned for this opposition. Before dealing, however, with these reasons, he would endeavour to answer the challenge of the noble Lord the Member for Tyrone (Lord Claud Hamilton.) The noble Lord said that it was incumbent on him to show some necessity for the establishment of these proposed new institutions; but two things were evident from the speech of the noble Lord. First, that he was not present in the House when the Bill was introduced, when he (The O'Connor Don) stated the reasons which influenced him in bringing in the Bill; and secondly, that he had not studied very accurately the criminal statistics of Ireland. In bringing in the Bill he (The O'Connor Don) stated the reasons which operated in his mind in inducing him to propose it; he believed those reasons strong ones. He would now repeat some of them. The noble Lord had drawn a very pleasing picture of the comparative immunity of Ireland from crime, and had boasted of the absence in Ireland of that great mass of juvenile criminality which was so conspicuous in Great Britain; but the noble Lord evidently had not read the judicial statistics published on the authority of the Irish Government. With the permission of the House he would read a passage from the last Report of Dr. Hancock, who was the gentleman who compiled the judicial or criminal statistics of Ireland, and in that passage would be found the answer to the question, why did he introduce this Bill? After giving the table containing comparison between the criminal classes in Great Britain and Ireland, Dr. Hancock goes on to say—

“ This table exhibits a very satisfactory result, that although the number of police in Ireland is double the number in a corresponding portion of the population of England and Wales, the number of criminal classes, other than vagrants and tramps, known to the police, is less than one-half, being 11,444 as compared with 22,923 in a corresponding portion of the population in England and Wales in 1864. In vagrants and tramps under sixteen years of age the proportion is reversed, being 3,475, or nearly double 1,812, the number in a corresponding portion of the population in England and Wales in 1864. In connection with this subject the total absence of industrial schools in Ireland should be borne in mind, whilst there were in certified industrial schools in England and Wales at the end of the year 1864 no less than

1,409, or 381 in a portion of the population of England and Wales corresponding to Ireland. During the past Session the law as to industrial schools has been consolidated for England and Wales by statute 29 & 30 Vict. c. 118; but this valuable code of laws, commencing in the year 1854 by statute 17 & 18 Vict. c. 86, and amended by successive enactments, after ten years' experience, has not yet been extended to Ireland. The continuous increase in the number of juvenile delinquents, which I have had to notice for three years, would appear to indicate the necessity of this extension to Ireland."

This was his answer to the challenge of the noble Lord. He would now pass on to the statements of his hon. Friend the Member for Londonderry (Mr. Peel Dawson.) Before doing so, he should point out to the hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine (Sir Hervey Bruce) that he was quite mistaken in supposing that the provisions for Treasury advances towards the maintenance of children in industrial schools was omitted from this Bill. Section 35 of the English Act provided that the Treasury should be empowered to make certain payments towards the support of children coming under the operation of that Act, and if the hon. Baronet looked to Clause 3 of the Bill before the House, he would find that it proposed to embody in this Bill Section 35 of the Act of last Session. The hon. Baronet's objection, therefore, on this head had no foundation in fact. As to the statement of the hon. Gentleman who moved the rejection of this Bill, it consisted of several objections; some of them had been answered by previous speakers, but to some of them he found it necessary to reply. His hon. Friend objected to the Bill, because he thought it would endanger the national system of education; he objected to it because it would give rise to sectarian disputes and differences; he objected to it because it would add to the burden of county rates; he objected to it because it was brought forward at an untimely moment, when the Irish Law Officers were absent; and finally, he objected to it because a certain portion of his constituents disliked it. This Bill, it was said, will interfere with the national system of education in Ireland. In the name of common sense, how? With what class of children did it deal? With those wandering and begging in the streets—those without any protectors, without any visible means of obtaining a livelihood, with the miserable little wretches at present growing up in ignorance, idleness, and crime. How can this affect National schools? None of these children attend such schools; there is no one to send them there, and, if there were, who would support them whilst attending there? The Bill, then, in no way affects children at present attending ordinary National schools. But it may be said it proposes to touch workhouse children; the schools in workhouses are National schools, and so far it interferes with national education. But what class of workhouse children does it affect? Only those who are so unruly and unmanageable in the workhouses that they can be taught nothing, and disturb the discipline of the establishment; and is it to be supposed that because a few bold, unruly, juvenile paupers may be transferred from workhouse schools to establishments in which a particular form of Christianity is taught, that thereby the national system of education is endangered? He was willing, however, to omit this clause in Committee, because he thought those unruly workhouse children ought rather to be sent to reformatories. But perhaps the hon. Gentleman would say that it was in the affirmation of the principle of granting public aid to educational establishments of a denominational character that he saw the danger to the national system of education. If so, he (The O'Connor Don) would only say that that principle had been already affirmed. It had been affirmed in the passing of the Irish Reformatory Act, and no one had ever heard that, by the passing of that Act, the system of national education had been weakened. The hon. Gentleman next laid great stress on the disastrous results of religious differences and disputes in Ireland. He entirely agreed with him in that, and believed that his Bill was so framed as to give the least possible opportunity for such arising. His hon. Friend, though objecting to what he called the sectarian character of the proposed institutions, did not directly suggest that they should be, like the national schools, mixed as to the religious persuasions of the inmates. Had he done so, he (The O'Connor Don) could easily show the objections to this course. The hon. Member did not propose this, but his argument simply amounted to this:—If this Bill be passed, in some isolated instances squabbles might arise as to the religious persuasion in which certain deserted children should be registered; therefore the Bill should be rejected, and not only these children but all the others who would come under its operation should be left neglected and deserted in the streets to grow up in vice, and to add to the criminality of the country. This was literally the logical conclusion of his hon. Friend's argument. These schools could not be other than denominational, or if they were religious disputes would be only intensified. It must be recollected that they were to be founded and managed by private individuals. Now, no private individuals would go to the trouble and expense of getting them up or undertake their management unless they could manage them in accordance with their own religious opinions. But supposing that children of all religious persuasions could indiscriminately be sent to any one of these institutions, this, instead of putting an end to religious disputes, would only increase them tenfold. Under the Bill as proposed the only dispute which could arise would be the registration of the child in the first instance. That settled, no other cause of difference could exist; but make these establishments open to children of all persuasions and your difficulties only commenced with the registration. Then followed immediately demands for the appointment of chaplains of the different persuasions, demands for the admission of visitors to teach religion, disputes as to the regulation of hours for religious instruction, and a whole host of other most difficult and annoying questions. One of the great recommendations, then, of the present Bill was that it got rid of all these perplexities, and reduced to the minimum the occasion for religious differences. It had been said that the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Maguire) had introduced a Bill on this subject and had failed; but the hon. Member for Cork never asked the opinion of the House on his Bill. He introduced his Bill late in the Session, found he had no time to proceed with it, and withdrew it. This, therefore, was no argument against the present Bill. His hon. Friend (Mr. Peel Dawson) objected to the expense this would cast on the county rates. He had no desire unnecessarily to increase the county rates, but the question really was not what will this Bill cost, but is it worth the cost? He maintained that it was. In an economic point of view he maintained that it ought to be supported. By taking up unfortunate vagrant children and rearing them in the habits of industry you diminish the danger of having to support them afterwards as criminals. Moreover, these children should be in some way supported, either by the proceeds of beggary or pilfering, or in institutions such as he proposed. If supported in either of the former ways, they would have to be supported entirely at local expense; if in industrial schools a grant would be received from the Treasury. He maintained, therefore, that the Bill proposed a relief not an addition to local burdens. He thought he had now answered all the objections coming from the other side, and would not detain the House much longer. He might, however, mention that the experience of the last few years justified the expectations of those who supported reformatory and industrial schools. These institutions had now for some years been tried in Great Britain, and were declared successful by the inspectors. About 75 per cent of those discharged from reformatories were known to have turned out well, and the same might be said of the industrial schools. Nor did the reformatories in Ireland show a different result. Out of all those discharged from one of the largest reformatories in Ireland — namely, Glencree, only twelve were re-convicted of crime, and out of 163 discharged all over Ireland in 1865, only three had relapsed. The results of the past legislation were therefore eminently satisfactory, and he felt sure the House would not refuse to extend to Ireland the benefits of those industrial institutions now carried on in Great Britain.

The O'Connor Don

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE thought the House greatly indebted to his hon. Friend (The O'Connor Don) for bringing forward this Bill, to which the real ground of opposition was not its interference with the national system—an argument which would not bear the slightest examination—but the lamentable prejudice of many persons of the Presbyterian denomination in Ulster. He never anticipated that that prejudice would have been stated so broadly and with so little excuse as it had been in relation to this Bill, when in the mouth of the hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Peel Dawson), it took the form of a horror of the system of proselytism. No one in that House would more cordially than himself join in the condemnation and detestation of the system of proselytism between the different communions in Ireland, which was, in fact, one of the greatest curses under which that country lay; but he must say, speaking candidly, and believing what he said to be the truth, that system of proselytism, although practised sometimes in an unjustifiable manner by all communions was, he thought, practised by the Catholic Church in a less systematic and aggressive manner than by the Protestant Establishment. The danger of proselytism, however, was no argument against the Bill. Its provisions prevented such a danger by enacting that children should only be sent to industrial schools under the exclusive management of their own denomination. His principal object, however, was to inquire from the Government whether they had formed any opinion as to the merits of this Bill. He hoped the Home Secretary would state the views entertained by the Government as to the extension of the industrial system to Ireland. He ventured to anticipate that they would not wish to make a distinction between the three kingdoms in this respect, or argue that what was good for Scotland and England was not good for Ireland; especially after the conclusive statement so carefully and accurately made by his hon. Friend in support of the second reading of the Bill.

MR. WALPOLE, having been appealed to by the right hon. Gentleman to say what the Government thought of this Bill, felt himself authorized to state, for himself and those Members of the Government he had consulted on the subject, that he could see no reason why the Bill, which was good for England and Scotland, should not, in principle, be extended to Ireland. The only doubt which suggested itself to his mind as requiring consideration was as to some of the reasons which had been stated in relation to vagrancy and quasi-offenders in Ireland. But the references made by the hon. Gentleman who moved the second reading of the Bill to the criminal statistics of Ireland had removed his doubts upon that point. There were other questions as to the amount of charge and the mode of charging for the establishment, which might require some further consideration in Committee than he had been able to give. But, reserving himself on these points until he could confer with his noble Friend the Secretary for Ireland, he should offer no objection to the second reading.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Tuesday 26th March.

Mr. Chichester Fortescue

CRIMINAL LAW BILL—[Bill 8.]

(Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Coleridge.

COMMITTEE.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Limitation of 22 and 23 Vict. c. 17) agreed to.

Clause 2 (On Acquittal, &c., of Person Indicted who has not been committed or held to Bail, Court may order Prosecutor to pay Costs to Accused if he think the Prosecution unreasonable).

MR. HURST objected to the clause. This proposal was inconsistent with what had hitherto been recognised as the true principle of criminal law, that prosecutors in criminal cases only performed their duty to the State, and therefore in all ordinary cases the costs of the prosecutions were paid by the country. Looking at the great difference of opinion as to what was or was not a reasonable cause, he thought the decision on the point ought not to be thrown upon the Court. He moved the omission of the 2nd clause.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, he thought we had acted too long on the principle contended for by the hon. and learned Gentleman. It was impossible to admit that prosecutors were invariably actuated by motives of public duty. There were a great many prosecutions instigated by private motives and of private interests. A system had grown up under which parties, having preferred an indictment before the grand jury and obtain a true bill on ex parte evidence, obtained a bench warrant under which the accused was taken into custody, and this for the purpose of inducing a compromise of private rights. This system had been carried to such lengths that the Legislature at length interfered and passed the Vexatious Indictments Act, which provided that no party should be at liberty to go before the grand jury unless the case had first of all been inquired into by a magistrate. If the magistrate was of opinion that the case was well founded the matter took the usual course. The Act had had a most beneficial effect; but since the prosecutor still had it in his power to go before the grand jury upon his own responsibility, the system, sometimes adopted with a view to extortion, had not been entirely put an end to. Cases of this nature had again and again come before him, and he did not remember one in which the prosecution had been successful. The invariable result was, either the case was abandoned before the jury, or the jury acquitted. The object was attained when the Bill was found, and the defendant, after being put to great inconvenience, after having engaged counsel and brought up his witnesses ready for trial, found the trial put off on some plausible pretext, and was driven under the pressure of a charge wantonly made to settle some civil dispute between the parties. Was it reasonable that the defendant should be obliged to bear all the expenses of that prosecution? Was it not more reasonable that the prosecutor, who had preferred the charge, and insisted on going on with it on his own responsibility, having failed in establishing the charge, which might be wholly groundless and brought in order to extort money, should, on a Judge's order, be obliged to pay the costs? The hon. and learned Gentleman was not correct in saying that the proposition was a novel one; in cases of libel, when the defendant was acquitted of the charge, the prosecutor had to pay the costs.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he could not agree with his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Russell Gurney). In all cases where prosecutions were instituted without reasonable and probable cause, not without malice, a civil action lay in which damages could be obtained. But it was a dangerous innovation to say where ex concessio there was no malice, and the proceedings were bonâ fide, if the Judge thought there was an absence of reasonable cause, the prosecutor should be ordered to pay the costs of indictment. The Act under which these prosecutions were frequently instituted was the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 17, s. 1. It enacted that—

“After the First day of September, 1859, no Bill of Indictment for any of the Offences following—namely, Perjury, Subornation of Perjury, Conspiracy, Obtaining Money or other Property by false Pretences, Keeping a Gambling House, Keeping a disorderly House, Any indecent Assault—shall be presented to, or found by, any Grand Jury, unless the Prosecutor or other Person presenting such Indictment has been bound by Recognizance to prosecute or give Evidence against the Person accused of such Offence, or unless the Person accused has been committed to or detained in Custody, or has been bound by Recognizance to appear to answer to an Indictment to be preferred against him for such Offence, or unless such Indictment for such Offence if charged to have been committed in England, be preferred by the Direction or with the Consent in Writing of a Judge of One of the Superior Courts of Law at Westminster, or of Her Majesty's Attorney General or Solicitor General for England.”

The 2nd clause of this Bill was to this effect—

“Whenever any Bill of Indictment shall be preferred to any Grand Jury, whether under the Provisions of the Act 22 & 23 Vict. c. 17, or otherwise, against any Person who has not been committed to or detained in custody, or bound by Recognizance to answer such Indictment, and such Bill of Indictment shall be ignored by the Grand Jury, or, being found by them, the Person accused thereby shall be acquitted thereon, and the Court before which the same Indictment shall be so preferred or tried shall be of opinion that such Indictment has been preferred without reasonable Cause, it shall be lawful for such Court, in its discretion, to direct and order that the Prosecutor or other Person by or at whose instance such Indictment shall have been preferred shall pay unto the accused Person the just and reasonable Costs, Charges, and Expenses of such accused Person and his Witnesses (if any) caused or occasioned by or consequent upon the preferring of such Bill of Indictment, to be taxed by the proper Officer of the Court; and upon Nonpayment of such Costs, Charges, and Expenses within One Calendar Month after the Date of such Direction and Order it shall be lawful for any of the Superior Courts of Law at Westminster, or any Judge thereof, or for the Justices and Judges of the Central Criminal Court (if the Bill of Indictment has been preferred in that Court), to issue against the Person, on whom such Order is made, such and the like Writ or Writs, Process or Processes, as may now be lawfully issued by any of the said Superior Courts for enforcing Judgments thereof.”

Therefore even when prosecutions were instituted by order of a Judge of a Superior Court or by order of the Attorney General, if the Judge thought fit, costs were to be awarded. But there was another objection. They were going to enact a new civil remedy. If one person prosecuted another without reasonable and probable cause, it was extremely probable that he did so also with malice. The issue in a case where a person who had been a prosecutor was made defendant in an action for malicious prosecution, was totally different from where a person was indicted. It was said that after acquittal, the prosecutor having directed his evidence to the question whether the defendant was guilty or not guilty, the Judge, without having a jury to assist him, without further evidence to show probable cause, was at once to say, “Here is a case in which costs ought to be given.” There was another inconvenience. The Judge at the trial might say there was not reasonable and probable cause, and condemn the prosecutor in costs; but the defendant bringing his action for malicious prosecution, the jury might by their verdict declare that there was reasonable and probable cause;—so that there would be conflicting judgments on the same point. In a civil action for malicious prosecution the defendant—the prosecutor in the criminal proceedings—was at liberty to show by his counsel and by his witnesses that he had reasonable and probable cause for preferring the indictment complained of; and if the jury were of opinion that no reasonable and probable cause had been shown they could punish him by making him pay the costs of the person indicted. The Bill, however, proposed that the Judge of the Criminal Court should, without giving the prosecutor an opportunity of showing that he had reasonable and probable cause for preferring the indictment, have power to order him to pay the costs. The clause was unnecessary, since the remedy it proposed to give in cases of malicious prosecutions was now obtainable by civil action.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS did not understand that the clause was intended to apply in cases where a Judge had authorized the indictment to be preferred.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, the clause would not apply to such cases—he intended to confine the operation of the clause to cases which came under the Vexatious Indictments Act.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE thought it would be dangerous to give the magistrates at quarter sessions the power of determining what did and what did not amount to reasonable and probable cause. He thought the best thing to be done was to get rid of the grand jury system altogether.

Question put, "That the Clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 93; Noes 64: Majority 29.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3 (Accused Person to be asked by Justice if he wish to call Witnesses. Their Depositions to be taken and returned to Court of Trial, if he call any.)

LORD HENLEY asked whether the right hon. Gentleman had any objection to omit the following words in the clause:—

"Such justice or justices, before he or they shall commit such accused person for trial or admit him to bail, shall, immediately after obeying the directions of the 18th section of the Act 11 &

The Solicitor General

12 Vict. c. 42, demand and require of the accused person whether he desired to call any witnesses; and whatever the accused person shall then say in answer to such demand shall be taken down in writing and signed by the said justice or justices, and kept with the depositions of the witnesses, and shall be transmitted with them in due course of law, and afterwards, upon the trial of the said accused person, the same may, if necessary, be given in evidence against him without further proof thereof."

He thought this provision would operate rather hardly in some cases. If witnesses were called at the trial, who had not been named to the magistrate, it would be urged against the prisoner that the defence had been "got up" in the interval, and it would in that way suffer prejudice. He should also be glad to know whether the defendant would have the right to demand an adjournment for the production of witnesses.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY thought the words to which the noble Lord referred were of great importance, because it frequently happened that the prisoner did not know at what time to call his witnesses, and it was therefore desirable that he should be formally asked whether he had any evidence to adduce in proof of his innocence.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS said, that it was the universal practice for the magistrate to ask the prisoner whether he had any witnesses.

MR. HENLEY said, as the magistrate in asking the question was required to caution the prisoner that anything he might say in reply would be used in evidence against him, it was clear that he must, before putting the question, have made up his mind to commit the prisoner for trial. Under such circumstances, it was not fair to require the prisoner to decide at the moment upon the expediency of calling witnesses in his behalf.

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS thought that the objection to the clause would be met by the omission of the words requiring that the answer of the accused person should be taken down and used in evidence against him.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, he did not object to the omission proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE inquired whether the prisoner was to be entitled, as a matter of right, to a remand when his witnesses were not in attendance?

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY took it for granted that the magistrates would grant a remand when the witnesses for the defence were not upon the spot when the case was heard.

MR. BRUCE wished to know whether the words of the clause included witnesses as to character?

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, the clause was only intended to include witnesses as to facts.

MR. HOWES asked whether the magistrate would be able to grant or refuse a remand at his discretion? He thought it was necessary for the protection of an accused person that his right to a remand for the purpose of bringing forward his witnesses should be distinctly stated in the Bill.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY replied that in all cases where a remand was necessary it would be granted. When the prisoner was again brought up his innocence might be clearly proved; in which case he would be at once set at liberty instead of being confined until the ensuing assizes, which might not be held for several months after his committal.

MR. HENLEY said, a new light appeared to be thrown on the matter by this proposal as to witnesses. It appeared from the statement just made by the right hon. and learned Gentleman that he intended that the magistrate should try the case from beginning to end, and not merely ascertain whether a prima facie case had been made out by the prosecution. If the prisoner were acquitted by the magistrate, his witnesses would not be paid.

MR. ROEBUCK thought that the more important question was under what circumstances was the magistrate the most likely to come to a proper decision. When the magistrate had heard the witnesses on both sides he would be in a better position to come to a decision upon the case than if he had only heard those called on behalf of the prosecution.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, a case had come to his knowledge in which the magistrate having decided that a prima facie case of robbery had been made out against a prisoner, had refused to hear his witnesses, although five respectable persons were ready to prove an alibi. When the case came on for trial the counsel for the prosecution at once withdrew the charge when he heard the evidence of the defence.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that as the clause now stood it would include the expense of witnesses to character. It would be quite sufficient to pay the witnesses who knew anything of the circumstances of the case.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 (If Witnesses for Accused, bound by Recognizance, appear at the Trial, Court may allow Expenses.)

MR. HENLEY wished to ask, why the granting of a certificate of attendance to the witnesses who had appeared on behalf of the prisoners should be optional on the part of the magistrate? If the object were to enable the magistrate to refuse the certificate of witnesses who had given their evidence in an unsatisfactory manner, or of witnesses who ought never to have been called, it was right enough; but certainly after witnesses had been bound over to attend the certificate ought not to be withheld. He therefore moved that the words "if such magistrate should think fit to grant the same" should be left out.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY said, that the object was simply to give to the magistrates a discretionary power in the case of those witnesses whose evidence was unsatisfactory or who ought not to have been called. He quite agreed, however, in the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman that a certificate ought not to be refused to a witness who had been bound over to attend.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD HENLEY thought that the fee of 1s. payable to the clerks for the names of witnesses handed to the prosecutor was too high. At petty sessions, for instance, seven or eight witnesses were often called in one case, and if 1s. were allowed for each name the expenses would be much increased. He suggested either that the fee should be lower, or that the duty should be attached to the offices held by the clerks.

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY suggested that the fee should be reduced to 6d.

Amendment made.

MR. CHILDERS thought the Committee ought to know, before the clause passed, what was the estimated cost which would be thrown upon the public by the Bill. The question was of some importance, for the cost of committals was already about £320,000; and it was now proposed to add the expenses of the defendant's witnesses. He presumed that the Treasury had taken the matter very carefully into consideration.

MR. HUNT said, that when the matter came before the Treasury the principle of the Bill was assented to generally, on the assurance of the Home Office that it would tend to the promotion of justice. He had no idea how an estimate such as that referred to by the hon. Gentleman could possibly be made out, inasmuch as the effect of the Bill could only be ascertained after it had been in operation for some time. As far, however, as his experience would enable him to judge, he believed the expense would be very small; for few prisoners called witnesses, and in cases of alibi they generally broke down.

MR. CHILDERS thought the answer just given was a very unsatisfactory one. He was of opinion that the Government ought, before assenting to the change, to obtain information on the point and lay it before the Committee.

MR. HUNT should like to ask the hon. Gentleman how he would set about the preparation of such an estimate. He was perfectly willing to admit that the Bill ought not to be hurried through Parliament; but he candidly confessed that, as far as he was concerned, he did not see that even by postponing it for three months he should be able to frame such an estimate.

MR. NEATE believed the answer which the Committee had just heard was a perfectly satisfactory one. He did not think that accused persons should be debarred from privileges which were now granted to those engaged in the prosecution. When equal justice was in question the expense ought not to be taken into consideration.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE was surprised to hear so much said about expense. Large sums were frequently voted for the most foolish purposes, and then nothing was heard about the expense. The question was whether the proposition was a just one or no. If it was, the question of expense was beneath the dignity of the country.

MR. HENLEY said, that at present the expenses of the witnesses for the prosecution were in part defrayed by the county and in part by the Treasury; but he could not see that any power was given by this clause to compel the Treasury to make payment towards the expenses of witnesses for the defence. He thought the witnesses for the defence should be paid as well as those for the prosecution.

Mr. Childers

SIR WILLIAM HEATHCOTE thought so to. He thought also that the expenses of the defendant's witnesses before the magistrate should be allowed; but he questioned whether, as the clause now stood, there was any power given by which witnesses for the defence could be paid in the case of a prisoner brought up before a magistrate and discharged. It was, he thought, of the utmost importance both to the ends of justice and to secure against injustice, that encouragement should be given to diligent sifting of the charges made in the first instance.

MR. HUNT said, that the Treasury certainly intended to contribute towards the expenses of witnesses for the defence, as they now contributed towards the expenses of witnesses for the prosecution. He thought, perhaps, as there were several of the suggestions made which ought to be considered, it would be better for the present to report Progress.

MR. CHILDERS said, that the contribution on the part of the Treasury towards the expenses of witnesses for the prosecution was not made under any statute, but was the subject of an annual Vote, the title of which, if the Bill were carried, would have to be altered, so as to include the expenses of witnesses for the defence. With regard to the estimate to which he had referred, it would not, he believed, be difficult to make, because the Treasury at present knew the average cost of witnesses for the prosecution in each county, and the clerks of the peace could easily furnish information as to the expenses of the witnesses for the defence.

MR. BRUCE agreed with the views expressed by the hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Sir William Heathcote.)

MR. RUSSELL GURNEY moved that the Committee report Progress.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Tuesday next.

INCLOSURE BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, Bill to authorize the Inclosure of certain Lands in pursuance of a Report of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Secretary WALPOLE and Mr. HUNT.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 72.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, March 14, 1867.

MINUTES.]—Sat First in Parliament—The Lord Feversham after the Death of his Father.

PUBLIC BILLS — First Reading — Consolidated Fund (£369,118 5s. 6d.)Second Reading — Railway Traffic Protection (43.)Referred to Select Committee—Hypothec Amendment (Scotland)* (33).

Committee—Trades Unions (31).

Report—Trades Unions (31 & 44).

HYPOTHEC AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND)
BILL [H.L.]—(No. 33.)—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee (on Re-commitment), read, and discharged; and Bill referred to a Select Committee.

And, on March 15, Select Committee nominated as follows:—

M. Tweeddale	L. Sundridge
E. Airlie	L. Wharncliffe
E. Selkirk	L. Hamilton
E. Graham	L. Panmure
L. Saltoun	L. Colonsay
L. Blantyre

TRADES UNIONS BILL—(No. 31.)

(The Earl of Belmore.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee on the said Bill read.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, their Lordships would recollect that, with respect to the outrages at Sheffield, it was proposed by the Bill that Special Examiners should be appointed by the Commissioners to conduct the local inquiry. It was now proposed that if the Royal Commissioners declined to conduct that portion of their inquiry themselves, the Chairman might apply to the Secretary of State, who might appoint not more than three persons to conduct the inquiry, who must be either of the Commission or barristers of not less than ten years' standing. This alteration would involve certain others, and he therefore proposed that the House should go into Committee, pro forma, for the purpose of making these necessary Amendments.

Lord CRANWORTH and Lord WHARNCLIFFE made a few observations which were not heard.

LORD ST. LEONARDS said, it was believed—whether truly or not he could not say—that the men who actually perpetrated these outrages in Sheffield were not the men who planned them, but that in the background there were other persons who really procured their perpetration. The Commission might elicit the fact whether this was so or not. As it was, the actual culprit or culprits walked about as innocent men; but when the Commission began to operate, and the culprits could save their lives, they would come forward and give evidence, and then they would walk abroad again just as they did now. The men would be just in the same position that they were in now, with this difference—that their character would be discovered and others would know what they had been guilty of. No mischief could be done; nothing could be done but what would operate beneficially. The case was so exceptional as to justify this exceptional legislation; were it otherwise, no one would be more unwilling than himself to support such a measure.

EARL GRANVILLE said, that if it were desired to postpone the further consideration of the Bill for a week it would be better not to prolong the present discussion, and he would therefore reserve any remarks he had to make.

House in Committee (according to Order); Bill reported, without Amendment; Amendments made; Bill re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next; and to be printed as amended. (No. 44.)

RAILWAY TRAFFIC PROTECTION

BILL—(No. 43.)

(The Lord Redesdale.)

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Redesdale.)

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND was understood to express a doubt as to the expediency of proceeding with this measure pending the inquiry on the subject now going on in the other House.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE asked the noble Duke to consider the position in which railway companies would be placed by the postponement of this Bill, supposing that such a measure was really desirable. The creditors of a company might seize the rolling stock and movable property unless the Bill to be passed was to have a retrospective effect. This was one of the best Bills ever proposed, considering that railways were made and privileges given to them for the advantage of the public, and creditors advanced their money with the full knowledge of this fact.

LORD REDESDALE said, he was placed in an embarrassing position by the request to abstain from proceeding with this Bill because the Government had a Bill of their own; but he believed that on fuller consideration of the subject noble Lords would see the desirableness of proceeding with the Bill. Its object was simply to suspend the power of creditors to take railways in execution until the 1st of August, and unless the protection was afforded which this Bill contemplated, seizures might take place during the time that the Bill of the Government was under discussion. No one could have any idea of the embarrassment at the present moment of the railway world except those who had inquired fully into the subject; and if this Bill passed it would to a certain extent tranquillize the minds of those who were interested in the various railway securities. If Parliament should be of opinion that it was not expedient to pass the Bill, creditors might proceed, and the railways might be thrown into confusion. He should not press the Bill if the noble Duke saw any serious objection to its principle; otherwise he did not think there was any reason why the Bill should not be read a second time, and the committal of it postponed to a distant day. He thought that even if it went no further, a good effect would be produced by it.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, the objection of his noble Friend (the Duke of Richmond) was not to the principle of the Bill. The House of Commons had appointed a Select Committee to inquire into the subject, which had passed Resolutions very much in the spirit of the noble Lord's Bill; and a Bill was about to be introduced based on that Report. If this Bill were proceeded with, they would be sending to the other House a Bill precisely similar in its character to that introduced there. But if the noble Lord thought there would be any advantage in the way of settling the minds of those interested, he saw no objection to the Bill being now read a second time, and hoped the noble Duke would concur in that view.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE asked if the Bill had not better be deferred till the Report of the Royal Commission was before their Lordships.

The Marquess of Clanricarde

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, the question under discussion would not be affected by the Report of the Royal Commission.

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE, as a Member of that Commission, hoped it would be able to present its Report early next month.

Motion agreed to: Bill read 2^a accordingly.

RECRUITING COMMISSION.

ADDRESS FOR A RETURN.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE rose to call the attention of the House to the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the recruiting for the Army. He should make no apology for troubling their Lordships by calling attention to this subject. Their Lordships were well aware that not many months ago a Commission was appointed by Her Majesty's late Government to take into consideration certain matters in reference to the system of recruiting in this country. That Commission had reported to Parliament, and its Report was in the hands of the public. But, before he entered into the particulars of their Report, he wished to say a few words respecting a charge brought against the Commissioners of having inadequately performed their duty, and of having sent forth a Report to the public which did not fully enter into all the matters referred to them. Now, he entirely denied the justice of any such charge; and he thought he had some reason to complain that the Commissioners were not better defended in "another place" than the Members of Her Majesty's late Government seemed disposed to defend them. It had been stated, too, that the Commission had trenched upon the vast subject of the re-organization of our military forces. Now, in the first place, he totally denied that his noble Friend below him, the late Secretary for War, would have been guilty of taking a step which would show that he was disposed to delegate to a Commission high functions which properly belonged to the Executive Government. The re-organization of our military forces, taking into consideration all the circumstances in other countries at this time, was a question second only in importance to that great domestic policy which was engaging the attention of the public at the present time; and to refer such a question to the consideration of a Commission would, in his opinion, be a weakness, and more than a weakness, on the part of any Cabinet; while the question really referred to the Commission was one which might be very properly so referred. The facts were these. Great alarm had been created—greater, perhaps, than was actually justified—with reference to the mode of maintaining the ranks of our army by the usual mode of recruiting. The Government and the military authorities, being naturally anxious on the subject, dealt with it as a question in which parol evidence was necessary, and they therefore referred it to a Commission. It was first of all proposed that the Commission should inquire into the condition of the general recruiting for the army, and the Commissioners were instructed to inquire into the operation of the laws at present in force for raising men to serve in our army, into the existing system of recruiting, and, after careful consideration of that important subject, to report any change in the existing law affecting the recruiting of men for the army which, in their judgment, would tend to facilitate recruiting and to retain in our army the men who had completed the first period of their service. It was usual on all occasions that the commands set forth in the Commission should be explained more in detail in Instructions from the Department which the inquiry concerned. Accordingly, as Chairman of the Commission he received from his noble Friend, the then Secretary of State for War, a Letter of Instructions, which were embodied in the Report of the Commission. That Letter instructed the Commissioners, first of all, to inquire why the number of recruits raised during the last few years had not been fully sufficient to meet the losses resulting from death and other causes; they were also to inquire into the remedies for that state of things, and into the operation of the Limited Enlistment Act; and they were further to inquire whether there existed any grievances in the army which might be detrimental to the enlistment of men into the army; they were likewise to consider whether, by substituting a system of general enlistment for a system of enlistment for particular regiments, the enlistment for the army might not be rendered more useful to the army itself and more popular among those who entered it. Finally, they were called upon to state how they might best induce time-expired men to re-enter on a second engagement; and failing to do that, how time-expired men might be induced to give their services to the public by means of certain arrangements so as to form a small nucleus of reserve to be called upon in case of accident. All that the Commissioners had done. They had given their best attention to the Instructions placed in their hands. It appeared to the Commissioners that the present system of recruiting was in many respects defective, that it might be amended with considerable success and rendered much more efficient. The Commissioners ascertained that the recruiting was intrusted to an officer at the Horse Guards, who was competent in every way to perform the duties of the office, provided those duties were confined within reasonable compass. The Adjutant General was responsible to the Commander-in-Chief for the recruiting of the army; he had, however, only time to give cursory attention to the recruiting, and the Commissioners therefore thought it better that it should be conducted by an officer specially put at the head of the department, responsible to the Adjutant General and through him to the Commander-in-Chief. He was glad to learn from a statement made in "another place" that it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to adopt that recommendation. He was certain it would be attended with great advantage to the service in enabling us to get a much larger number of troops with much greater facility; and he believed that when that system came to be worked it would not be one bit more expensive than the present system of recruiting for the army. So much for the administrative system of recruiting. The Commissioners then proceeded to inquire whether there were any grievances of which the soldier had to complain, and which tended to prevent men from enlisting with that freedom which they had exhibited in former times. The Commissioners found what appeared to them to be a great number of petty grievances, of perhaps no great consequence if taken singly, but in the aggregate amounting to a system which they believed to have a bad effect in deterring young men from entering the army. They found that while the soldier was supposed to have 1s. a day for pay and 1d. a day for beer money, the men complained that no sooner were they enlisted in the ranks than they discovered that the 1s. a day never came into their pockets. There were stoppages for clothing, stoppages for rations, and stoppages for this and the other; so that the soldier never was certain what the amount was which he should receive. In fact, the impression got abroad on account of those stoppages that faith was not kept with the soldier. They found that the principal of those stoppages of which complaint was made arose from the soldier being required to provide himself with a fatigue jacket and foraging cap, which cost him 12s. a year. Now, it certainly did appear to him a striking anomaly that the soldier had to provide himself with this fatigue jacket. He did not see why a soldier should be called upon to pay for a jacket which was his undress, and which he wore when he was doing all the hard work required of him in quarters; while the tunic, his show dress, was provided for him by the public. He could see no good reason for this; and the Commission, taking the same view as he did, came to the conclusion that the public should take upon itself the burden of paying for this jacket. Then there was another thing which came before the Commission. It was strongly urged that calling on the soldier to pay for washing the sheets used on his bed was not right. That stoppage he thought amounted to 2d. a month, and it was a tax the public ought to pay. Another question which came before the Commission was that of rations; and they had very strong evidence, especially in respect of the cavalry and artillery, that three-quarters of a pound of meat a day was not a sufficiency of animal food to enable the men to go through the work expected of them. As regarded the infantry in quarters where there was not much to do, perhaps three-quarters of a pound might be sufficient; but speaking of the troops generally, all the testimony which the Commission heard led them to the conclusion that the men should have one pound of meat at home, seeing that they had that quantity, with various other additions to their other rations, when abroad. The Government seemed disposed to treat those questions of stoppages and of an addition of a quarter of a pound of meat to the daily rations in a liberal spirit; but he ventured to think that they proposed to proceed on a wrong principle. If he properly understood the statement made in "another place" by the gallant General who he deeply regretted was no longer in the office which he had so ably filled (General Peel), the Government proposed, in lieu of a remission of the stoppages and of an addition of a quarter of a pound of meat per day, to give the soldiers throughout the army an additional 2d. a day. The result would be this—for two or three years, perhaps, the clamour would be laid asleep; but in the course of time these very same grievances would crop up again, and having parted with our money by giving increased pay, we should still have to deal with the stoppages and the meat question. Again, he must observe that he could not concur with the gallant General in his mode of increasing the pay. The gallant General, as he understood, proposed to give 2d. a day additional pay to the recruit, but only 1d. more to the old soldier; so that it would seem to the public that they attached more value to the raw recruit than to the man who had served years in the army. Now, the Commission took an opposite view. They would remit to the recruit all the stoppages for clothing. They did not propose to increase the pay of the recruit; but when the old soldier came to re-enlist they would give him 2d. a day additional in consideration of his past services. He was prepared to maintain that the proposals of the gallant General were not near so economical as those which the Commission had suggested. According to the recommendations of the Commission, the abolition of the stoppages for the shell jacket and the forage cap would cost £80,000 a year. The cost of an additional quarter of a pound of meat a day to 70,000 men—taking that as the number of troops at home who would be receiving it—would be £187,500; but supposing the number at home to be 80,000, the cost would be £23,000 more, or £200,000; so that, with the £80,000 for the jackets and forage caps, the entire cost would be £280,000; while the proposals of the gallant officer the late Secretary for War would involve an additional expenditure of £376,000. There were a great many other recommendations of the Commission which might be carried out simply by arrangements made by the Secretary of State for War in concurrence with the illustrious Duke at the head of the army. Among the complaints brought before the Commission was a strong one against keeping soldiers in camps during winter. He was not aware that camps were continued during the winter in any other country. In France, Russia, and other countries there were camps for instruction during the summer months; and he thought it was of great consequence to the army that camp instruction should be carried on actively and zealously in this country; but when the winter came the troops should be removed from camps which did not afford the comfort of ordinary barracks, and should be dispersed in winter quarters, where they would have an opportunity of mixing with their fellow-citizens generally. The result of this would be that they would return to the camp in better spirits and in better order for the active duties of camp service. The Commission recommended a system of enlistment for general service, and of that recommendation the late Secretary of State for War approved. Another recommendation was that, following what was already practised in the navy, institutions should be erected in which boys from the age of fifteen up to seventeen-and-a-half or eighteen years of age should be instructed for service in the army. It appeared to the Commissioners, however, that a system of this nature would entail a great deal of expense. Accordingly, the Report merely touched upon the facts, and left it to the discretion of the Government to say whether a course which had proved successful in the navy should be extended to the sister service. For his own part, he believed that the system would provide the army with a number of men who eventually would become the most useful and valuable in the ranks. No subject could be fraught with more vexation than that of barrack damages. With this he perceived the Government proposed to deal in a somewhat singular manner, the gallant General proposing that the troops should repair their own damages. What that meant exactly he could not say. It was his own opinion that troops ought not to be called on for such repairs at all, except in the case of wilful damage. In the Prussian service barrack damages were never heard of, unless in the case of wilful damage to public property; and in that case the soldiers who committed it were punished and fined until the public property was restored. Except in similar cases the article of barrack damages ought to be scored out of soldiers' accounts altogether, and the change, he believed, would afford very great satisfaction. The Commissioners were also of opinion that it was a matter of some moment to encourage the passage of militiamen into the regular army as a good fountain from which the line might be supplied; but they found there was one objection to it on the part of the militiamen in the fact that every militiaman, after a year's service, who wished to enlist in the line, had to refund 18s. 6d. of the bounty he had received for the year. The Commissioners recommended that the deduction of 18s. 6d. made from a militiaman on passing into the line should no longer be made, but that there should be a simple transference of services. This recommendation, which he thought a very useful one, did not appear to have been adopted. He should be glad to hear they had, as he thought it would open a very good source of supply of troops to the line. The attention of the Commission had likewise been directed to the operation of the Limited Enlistment Act; how far it had interfered to stop recruiting in the army, or deprived the country, at an inconvenient time, of the services of men who were in their prime as soldiers. Much had been said against that Act, and great and unnecessary prejudice with regard to it existed, he believed, among commanding officers in the army. Scarcely one of those who appeared as witnesses failed to declare that it had been the ruin of the army. But on being asked if they would like to go back to the old system of twenty-one years' service, the answer was, that it was quite impossible; they could not do it. And while all condemned the Act, not one of them had anything to suggest in its place. The Act was introduced by himself, and after giving it his consideration, he was not prepared to say the law required alteration. In his opinion it was a good measure, and one which, he thought, would work well if other circumstances were made to work well with it. He had, however, no objection to yield his own opinion upon that point if by so doing he could reconcile all parties to one general view; and in that spirit he suggested that, instead of making differences between the services—namely, twenty-one years for the infantry and twenty-four years for the cavalry, there should be one uniform period of twenty-one years for all; and that that should be divided into two periods—namely, of twelve and nine years, to complete the twenty-one years for the pensions. Under these circumstances he anticipated that the soldier, having served so much of the period as twelve years, would be indisposed to retire without securing his claim to a pension, and therefore they would be more likely to retain the twelve years' men than the ten years' men. He had also thought that by making some alterations in other respects, and enabling the soldier to carry to the pension a larger sum than at present, they would hold out inducements to the men to enlist, not only in the first instance, but to carry on their service until it was no longer required. The Commissioners also recommended some arrangement with regard to the good-conduct pay, whereby it would be acquired in a shorter time, and they also suggested a mode of dealing with it under the direction of the Commander-in-Chief, whereby it would be made more acceptable than at present. He would not go into minute details upon the point, but would merely refer to the evidence, which he thought deserving the attention of the military authorities. The Commission did not find that the Limited Enlistment Act had in any way interfered with the readiness of recruits to enter the army; and it was proved that recruits did not enter as readily for permanent as for the limited service under the Act; in fact, it was only in accordance with human nature to suppose that it would be so. Another point with regard to the Act which the Commissioners were called upon to consider was the way in which men could be induced to renew their service after the first period had expired. They proposed to give the old soldier on renewing his service an extra pay of 2*d.* a day, and that he should, by arrangement with the Commander-in-Chief, be exempt from certain drill, and that he should be treated more on the footing of an old soldier than a raw recruit, and be exempted from some of the drills which recruits had to undergo. Such a modification would, it was thought, exercise a considerable effect in inducing valuable men to re-enter the army. But with regard to this question of re-entry some drawbacks existed. It was the opinion of most persons competent to form an opinion that a soldier in the ranks fitted originally for the discharge of duty of all kinds was not worth much after fourteen or fifteen years' service. Probably, provision might be made enabling men of this class to retire from the service at the expiration of a given number of years, and still to work out their claim to a pension by serving the remaining period either in the militia or some other force. He would not call it an army of reserve, because that would be giving a great name to a very little thing. The Commission thought, with the advantage of the 2*d.* a day in addition to the good-conduct pay, there would be no occasion to raise the pension, seeing that a man could retire with the ample pension of 15*d.* a day. The questions connected with the re-organization of the forces, so as to form an army of reserve, the Commission believed to be outside their powers; and, for himself, he might say that if it had been proposed to refer so large a question to the Commission he should have declined to serve. The intentions of the Government in that respect, as developed in the other House, fell far short of the exigencies of the case. A measure had been proposed which was complex as well as inadequate, the result of which would be to take from the militia, which the Commissioners recommended should be maintained at its full quota of 120,000 men, one-fourth of that number, who should be ready in case of an outbreak of hostilities to join en masse the Queen's army, and be ready to take the field. But if that were the full extent of the promised army re-organization, and all they had to hope for in the way of opening up our military resources, he was much disappointed. The number of our male population between the ages of eighteen and forty-two capable of bearing arms on an emergency was, he believed, 5,000,000. It was hard, indeed, then, if at least one-tenth of that number could not be imported by some simple arrangement into the ranks of the Queen's army and militia in a case of emergency. He would not be content until he saw the military organization of the country upon such a footing as would permit our placing in the field at least this number of men in the course of three weeks or a month after the suspension of diplomatic arrangements with any country in Europe; and he believed that if the Secretary of State for War were to address himself earnestly to the question, and without calling to his assistance a Commission, or a number of Commissions, would act in concert with the officers of the army and the illustrious Duke at their head with the law as it stood, such a scheme as he had described might be devised. Their Lordships would remember that although service in the Queen's army was voluntary, and that army existed but from year to year, by the vote of the House of Commons, service in the militia was compulsory, and that although compulsion to serve in it was suspended from year to year the power of compelling was not dead, but only dormant; and he was inclined to the opinion that it should no longer remain dormant. If they were to have the militia increased to any amount by Act of Parliament, he had no hesitation in saying that any Government bold enough to put the compulsory system into operation—if the voluntary system failed—would find themselves supported by the voice of the country and by a patriotic press ; and that without very much greater expense, a scheme might be devised of passing men through the militia with better training than at present, and with a shorter period of service in the militia, and sending them to any army of reserve, where they might accumulate in large numbers until, including the Queen's army and the standing militia, a force might be brought together of at least 500,000 men. That was his opinion, and he believed also the opinion of many others ; but it required great boldness and firmness on the part of the Government to handle ; but it was one of those questions on which, if the Government were bold enough to enter, they were entitled to the support not only of those who followed them as a matter of course, but of every man who had the interest of his country sincerely at heart. In order to put himself in order he moved for a Return of the recommendations of the Commission for Recruiting, which had lately reported, and in company with it the number of those recommendations which the Government were about to adopt and the number which they decline to accept.

The Earl of Dalhousie

The Earl of Dalhousie

Moved, That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Return of the Recommendations of the Recruiting Commission of 1866, and the Steps taken thereon.—(The Earl of Dalhousie.)

THE EARL OF LONGFORD said, that he appeared accidentally on both sides of this Question. He was a Member of the Royal Commission of last year, of which the noble Earl who had just spoken was the Chairman ; and he had since become a humble Member of the Government, which had to some extent disagreed with the recommendations of the Commission, and had adopted other propositions. He agreed both with the Commission and the Government. The recommendations of the Commissioners were twenty-eight in number, and in them he generally concurred ; but he also put forward some suggestions of his own which were not adopted by the Commission. He must say, on reflection, that he could not help thinking that the Commissioners had rather directed their attention to matters affecting the condition of the soldier, in preference to the immediate question of obtaining recruits ; and therefore when the time came for the War Office to consider their Report and what action should be taken upon it, it was decided—and he thought rightly—that a small immediate addition to the pay of all ranks would be preferable to those more remote advantages which had been proposed by the Commission. Both had the same object in view—namely, the improvement of the condition of the military service, so as to make recruiting more popular and successful. Another object was to make the recruiting service more respectable—in which he cordially agreed—and give the army a better character in the country than it generally enjoyed, and which sometimes he thought it unfairly bore. He had often regretted the manner in which the recruits for the army had been spoken of even by military officers, who six months afterwards spoke of the same men as noble fellows, whom they were proud to command. Recruits had been spoken of as “the dregs of the population,” the “sweepings of the streets,” “the riff-raff of the population,” and other hard names, which they scarcely in all instances deserved. Undoubtedly the recruiting depôt was a sort of Cave of Adullum, open to the distressed and discontented classes ; but he did not believe from the results that all who entered came under these derogatory descriptions. He certainly continued to think that, from whatever class the recruits were drawn, a direct and immediate addition to their pay affecting every recruit from the moment of enlistment would have a more speedy and satisfactory effect in filling the ranks than any postponed additions of pay and pensions, which, though excellent in themselves, did not immediately act on the minds of the population. During the last few months recruiting had been more successful, and the deficiencies of 4,000, 5,000 and 6,000 on the 1st of January in three successive years was now only 1,300. It was not, however, difficult to suggest reasons for this. It was notorious that work had been very slack, which was a condition favourable to the recruiting service. “It was an ill wind that blew nobody good,” and the crisis in the City had a very favourable effect on the muster rolls. When the Commission was proposed last year, and he was asked to become a member, he must confess he had doubts whether the inquiry was altogether necessary, and he expressed his doubts to the Marquess of Hartington. The noble Lord thought otherwise, and at his instance he consented to become a member.

The subject of recruiting had been thoroughly considered by Lord Hotham's Commission, and all that remained to learn was further experience of the Army Service Act, passed in 1847, which introduced or revived the principle of limited enlistment. That Act was passed against the remonstrances of military men in both Houses of Parliament; and in their Lordships' House it passed with a very slight majority, which looked, on reading the division list, a party one, for proxies were called, and it was remarkable that the majority of the few military Members of their Lordships' House voted against the Duke of Wellington. The noble Earl on the cross-benches (Earl Grey) who moved the second reading of that Bill gave a complete military statement; but the speakers who followed remarked that it was one long argument against the necessity of his own Bill. The Bill, however, was passed. Expectations were held out that the measure would introduce a better class of recruits, who after their limited term of service would join an army of reserve; and there was even a happy dream that these superior recruits, further improved by military training, habits of discipline and good order, obedience, and even morality, would revert to the community as valuable members of society, and still further raise the character of the military service. But the result had been that superior recruits had not joined the army, the discharged soldiers had not joined the reserve force, and they had not yet heard that society had gained much by the return to its bosom of those of its members who had received moral training at Aldershot and Chatham. All that could be said of that Act was that its working had not proved so inconvenient and damaging to the service as had been expected. Of 100 recruits about fifty reached the end of their first term of service; of those fifty about half re-engaged; it has been more, but the proportion is declining; so that we lose only a little less than half of the best men in the service. This might not seem a very bad result numerically, but it was difficult to describe the inconvenience in regiments, the expense of passages, the difficulty of collecting a force, or of meeting the requirements of our Indian and colonial service, which were occasioned by the uncertainty whether soldiers would renew their engagements. He found during the deliberations of the Commission it would have been hopeless to propose any extension of the period of service; but he certainly thought that an extension of the first term from ten to twelve years was a step in the right direction; and he was glad that the Commissioners had turned a deaf ear to the suggestions which had very frequently been made, and which, no doubt, would still be made, as to the reduction of the period of service, and the establishment of enlistment for three, four, or five years. The fact was, that at present the period of home service was so short, and the conditions of home service on account of garrison duties and detachments so unfavourable, that there was no time for drilling or completing the training of large numbers of recruits. Even without such an accident as the Fenian campaign, the greatest inconvenience arose from the shortness of the term of home service. The noble Earl (the Earl of Dalhousie) mentioned some recommendations of the Commission. One of them, the appointment of an officer to superintend the recruiting service, had been adopted; but the noble Earl was aware that by the substitution of direct payment for prospective advantages so much money had been absorbed as rendered the adoption of other recommendations impossible. They would, however, be carried out as far as possible from time to time. With regard to the recommendation for the appointment of training schools on the same principle as training ships in the navy, he looked upon the suggestion with great favour and would do all in his power to get them established. With reference to barrack damages it was proposed that the troops should repair their own damages. The experiment had been tried at Parkhurst and found to answer well. He thought that the question of camps had pretty well been settled already for our troops were very scattered, and mixed very freely with their fellow-citizens in garrison towns. With regard to the army of reserve, the Government proposed to adopt one of the recommendations of the Commission, which gave the power of commuting the latter portion of a soldier's period of service with a view to his joining an army of reserve. He thought, however, that it was very unreasonable that the soldiers purchasing their discharge should be compelled to join the army of reserve, and he did not see how such a plan was ever likely to be adopted. But it must be observed that all successful systems of reserves, by whatever name they may be called, are based on conscription; for, if improved modes are adopted of taking men out of the ranks, such as by very short periods of service, some improved way of filling the vacancies must also be established. Parliament, however, had shown no disposition to consent to the principle of conscription, and while that disposition remained, coupled with an objection to increased outlay, we must submit to the mortification of having a force which had been described as scarcely sufficient even in a time of peace. The fact was that at present we were endeavouring to make a small army do the work of a large one. The numerical force of it was merely sufficient in a time of peace, and he would not encourage the hope of a good reserve without much bolder measures than any which had been yet proposed. He might also inform the noble Earl, who had expressed a strong desire that facilities might be afforded for the transfer of recruits from the militia to the army, that it was the intention of the Government to remit the 18s. 6d. now deducted from the bounty paid to the recruits on such occasions.

The Earl of Longford

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON assured the noble Earl who had first spoken that he was quite right in supposing that there was no intention on the part of the Government of his noble Friend behind him (Earl Russell) of delegating to the Commission any portion of the duties which ought to be discharged by the responsible Ministers of the Crown. He was certainly, for one, of opinion that it was just as necessary to maintain the responsibility of the Ministers of the Crown in the present time as it was in former days. Still, however, their Lordships would probably agree in the opinion that the Letter of Instructions addressed by the Marquess of Hartington to the Commissioners covered a very large and important field of inquiry. It was perfectly true that at the time when the Commission was issued the public attention had not been specially directed by the great events which had but recently taken place on the Continent to the question of a large military re-organization; but, still, the Commissioners were empowered to take a wide range in their inquiry. He should not enter at any length into the remarks of the noble Earl behind him (the Earl of Dalhousie) on the proposed increase to the daily pay of the soldier, as that proposal would be fully dealt with in "another place."

There seemed, however, to him to be a good deal of force in the argument employed by the noble Earl, that the proposed increase of pay would still leave the other causes of discontent undealt with, and that those causes of discontent would, when the increase had been firmly established, still call for remedy. With reference to the working of the Limited Service Act, he must say that he concurred in the spirit of the remarks of his noble Friend behind him in preference to those of the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for War. It was obvious that the majority of the officers of the army viewed that Act with disfavour; but the noble Earl the Under Secretary of War must have looked at that Act and the discussion which took place at the time of its passing very cursorily to have described as he had done the able and argumentative speech made by the noble Earl on the cross-benches (Earl Grey) who had introduced the Bill to their Lordships. For his own part, he must say that his recollection by no means agreed with that of the noble Earl, nor did he think that the results of that Act had been contrary to what its promoters intended. No doubt that Act had, in one respect, somewhat disappointed expectation, that was to say, with respect to the resumption of service by men entitled to their discharge. It was expected by many that these men would have returned to the service; but, as the noble Earl had stated, nearly one-half of them had taken their discharge. He was not going to express an opinion as to the extending the period of service from ten to twelve years—if that measure were to be carried out it must be brought before the House in the shape of a Bill, when its merits could be discussed; but he would point out one fact with regard to that recommendation. It was perfectly true that an overwhelming majority of the officers of the army examined before the Commission were in favour of the change from ten years to twelve; but, with one exception, no question upon the subject appeared to have been put to the non-commissioned officers or privates, who could have given the best evidence as to what was likely to induce men in their station in life to join the army, and in that instance the witness said he did not believe the alteration would have any effect. There was, however, one thing which he hoped Her Majesty's Government would take into serious consideration. They all knew that when the early period of a man's life was past, any change in his employment or alteration in his mode of life was a matter of difficulty; and, of course, the older he was the greater would be the difficulties which a man so changing would have to encounter. If that was true with respect to a man in civil life, how much more true must it be of the soldier who was accustomed to be fed, lodged, clothed, and in every action of his life commanded by other persons? Every year, therefore, that was added to the length of his first engagement after a certain period tended to render him at the end of it less fit to take his place in civil life. And that was a question of importance not only as regarded the interests of the men, but also as regarded the recruiting of the army. He had heard military men who were opposed to the Ten Years' Enlistment Act say that it sent men back to civil life without the means of earning a subsistence, that they therefore led a miserable existence, and deterred others from joining the army. That was true to some extent; but he also thought it was often greatly exaggerated. But when the noble Earl implied that those who left the army were no acquisitions to the society to which they returned, their Lordships would find in the blue book an answer to that; because they were told that one great cause why these men did not re-engage was the ready employment which they found in railway companies and other great public establishments, on account of the discipline and good training which their ten years' military life afforded. The notion, therefore, that ten years' men gave the public a bad idea of the military life was much exaggerated; but the evil, such as it was, would be increased just in proportion to the number of years added to the ten years' service. That consideration was one well worthy of attention, and the Government must be prepared to meet it when the Bill on the subject came before that House. And, now, a few words upon a subject which the noble Lord opposite touched on so lightly—namely, the providing a reserve for the army. The attention of those whose duty or inclination had led them to bestow thought on military questions had been long directed to this difficult matter, though that of the public had not been attracted to it till very recently in consequence of the course of the German war, and the unexampled rapidity with which Prussia had placed a large army in the field, and augmented it from her reserve. But when we looked at this matter by the light of events in foreign countries, we should always carry along with us certain points which constituted a marked distinction between this and other countries. The first distinction—the geographical—was satisfactory. We heard of vast numbers of men—500,000 and 700,000—which formed the military organization of Prussia, Austria, or France. But we should always remember that those countries were much more liable to sudden invasion than we were. He was not one who held that an invasion of this country was an impossibility, nor was he insensible to the change which had been produced, disadvantageously for us, by the adoption of steam navies and the increased powers of locomotion. Such a charge could not be brought against any Member of the late Government; because from 1859 to 1866 they had adopted a series of measures with a view to meet the altered circumstances of the case and add to the strength of the country. But it must be admitted that that upon which we had relied—at times, perhaps, too much—the sea, constituted a barrier much stronger and more defensible than any land frontier. But, on the other hand, we had not that compulsory system which formed the basis of the great Continental military organizations. And, with regard to the reserve, which formed the other portion of the military system of Continental Powers, it should be borne in mind that they employed a constant, far-reaching police surveillance, which enabled them when a man had left the army to keep their eye upon him, to know what became of him, and to call him back into the ranks at any moment. There was also in the nature of our military requirements an important difference which ought not to be overlooked—he meant the foreign service which was required of our troops. Austria and Prussia had no foreign service; the foreign service of France in Algeria applied to by far the smaller portion of her army. But, as for us, we were just now considering ourselves fortunate with regard to our infantry, who formed the staple of our army, that we had a fair hope of requiring them to serve only ten years abroad for five at home—that is, that two-thirds of our force should be employed on foreign service while one-third served at home. These were things which we must take into our consideration when we compared our military institutions with those of other countries. There was another point to which he wished to refer, and in doing so he reserved to himself the amplest power to give to the proposals the fullest consideration. It was now only a week since the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the late Secretary of War (General Peel), whose resignation of office he, and he believed every one on both sides of the House, sincerely regretted, had made these proposals known to the public. Any proposals coming from the gallant General were entitled to their best consideration. The few observations which he should make, therefore, ought to be looked on rather in the nature of doubts than of positive opinions. On the question of reserves, he entirely agreed with the gallant General, that if they had a reserve at all it must resolve itself into two parts—a reserve for foreign service and a reserve for home service. By a reserve for foreign service he meant a reserve of men who could be called out immediately for service abroad on the occasion of foreign war. And by a home reserve, men who would only be available in the case of invasion. With respect to the reserve for foreign service, he believed that the Government proposal contained the germ of an important arrangement. As he understood, the intention of Her Majesty's Government was that in regiments at home men should be allowed to retire on furlough before the term of their service had expired, with the simple liability of being recalled to the ranks in the event of war.

Earl de Grey and Ripon

THE EARL OF DERBY was understood to say that this only applied to men who had returned from foreign service.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he could not help thinking that the principle of that proposal was capable of a wider and more extensive application. He took the principle to be this—that they should shorten the first term of service by granting unlimited furlough with the liability of being recalled to the ranks on the occurrence of war. He believed that that plan was capable of greater extension than had been given, and he thought he saw in it the germ of an arrangement which would give them an army of reserve of considerable strength. He did not like using the term “army of reserve,” because phrases of that description were likely to mislead, as implying a very large number of men. But whatever the force might be called it was quite clear that anything under 40,000 or 50,000 men would not meet the requirements of the case. But when he came to consider the other portion of the plan he must confess, as far as he understood the details, he entertained doubts of its advisability. It was proposed to obtain engagements from not more than a fourth of the men in the militia, which would authorize their transference to the line. It ought to be considered whether it would not be wise to keep the home reserve distinct from the foreign reserve. If 30,000 men, and those probably the most soldierlike, were withdrawn from the militia at a time of great emergency, the militia regiments would be weakened, and double recruiting would have to be prosecuted for the militia as well as the line. But, under any circumstances, the training the men got in the militia would be necessarily inferior to that obtained by men to be secured in the other way suggested by the Government. Besides, they would have to take men from the militia of all periods of service, and even five years' service in the militia would give only a maximum of six weeks' training in any one year. That could hardly be called training that would qualify men to take their places in regiments of the line and to form part of an efficient reserve. Arrangements might be made to meet that objection, but it deserved serious consideration. There was a feeling on the part of the public that with an army of reserve there ought to be a countervailing reduction of expenditure on the army. Looking to the large amount of our Army and Navy Estimates, it ought to be the constant endeavour of every Government—and it was to a greater extent than Governments received credit for—not to add to our expenditure, and if more was required to be spent in one direction, to make a countervailing reduction in another. If we had to consider only the wants of the home service, the establishment of a large reserve in England would give us the means of a considerable reduction in the number of men in the army; but we must bear in mind that the number of men at home was determined by two distinct considerations—our home requirements and the requirements for colonial relief. We should soon arrive at a point at which the question of colonial reliefs would become the really determining question of the number of men to be kept at home, and that was a question of general policy and not of military organization. He would only point to this matter as showing the difficulties that were involved. There were two forces which now constituted the home reserve—the Volunteers (including the Yeomanry) and the militia. It had been rightly pointed out the other night that from the constitution of the Volunteer force, composed as it was of men engaged in commercial and industrial pursuits, it could not possibly be placed in camp or garrison except at the last moment, and when an emergency actually arose. Therefore, the Volunteers could only constitute the second portion of our home reserve. The first portion was the militia; and it was because of that that he deprecated mixing it up with the reserve for foreign service. The militia ought to be kept intact. It had too often been said that the militia had been disregarded of late years; he must give that statement a most complete denial. Lord Herbert, from the time he took office, directed his attention to the militia as much as to any other portion of our military force; and it was through his exertions, and the exertions of those who had succeeded him, that the militia had been placed in a more satisfactory condition than it was at the time it was disembodied in 1859. He did not deny that it might be improved in efficiency both as to officers and men. There was not a sufficient number of officers of military training and experience; and this was well worth the consideration of the Government. The period of training was not limited only by financial considerations. One object was to obtain men who, when they had completed their training, would return to civil life and find continuous employment. Militia training must never be so long as to break off a man's connection with his previous employer, and make it difficult for him to find employment again. These were matters well worthy of consideration. He accepted the warning on the subject of reserves contained in the Report of the Royal Commission, and agreed that it was urgent the question should be settled at an early period; but although he deprecated delay, he deprecated still more undue haste. It was easy to give; it was impossible to take away. They could give extra pay; but when once it was given it could not be taken away. They might form a new force and enter into engagements of a novel character with the men; and whether the force was practically useful or not they must maintain the force and the engagements. Therefore it was a matter in which they ought to proceed without undue delay, but at the same time with the utmost deliberation; and he was confident it was only by full, fair, and deliberate consideration that they could overcome the many difficulties which beset this most important question.

Earl de Grey and Ripon

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE: My Lords, none can know better than my noble Friends sitting on the opposite side of the House the difficulties which beset this question. They arise, on the one hand, from the great freedom which is enjoyed by every subject of the Queen, and from the facility with which every individual of any distinction or military experience having any idea of his own can suggest improvement in our military organization. On the other hand, the House of Commons wisely, prudently, and necessarily looks after the expenditure of the country, which must not and ought not to exceed that which is absolutely necessary. On the one hand, we are told that the military authorities are not doing this and that which would be for the advantage of the soldier; and, on the other, we are told by the House of Commons, which holds the purse-strings of the nation, that we are spending a great deal too much money, and that, so far from entering into new arrangements and organizations, we ought to curtail our expenditure, and make our present organization less expensive. I think there is great reason and justice in what is said on both sides, and I only wish to impress upon your Lordships that these facts place the military authorities in a most delicate and difficult position. This debate has been produced by the Report of the Royal Commission on Recruiting, to the appointment of which the Marquess of Hartington assented, because of a well-founded impression which had got abroad—an impression which I fully shared—that the difficulties of recruiting in this country were becoming so grave as to endanger the efficiency of the army, and that the matter ought, therefore, to be fully investigated. The object with which the Commission was appointed was to obtain recruits; and the real question is, how they are to be obtained. In theory there is no question that if you improve the condition of the soldier it is far more to his advantage than an addition to his pay; but it is not so regarded practically, it is pay that will induce men to come, and not improvements of their condition. I admit that the reasoning does not appear sound, but in practice it is found to be so. My noble Friend who brought this question forward (the Earl of Dalhousie) asked me, when a witness before the Royal Commission, whether I agreed in the various recommendations of the Commission? I entirely agreed with my noble Friend that the not making the soldier pay for his necessaries and barrack damages would be a very great and desirable object, and would give great relief to the soldier. These advantages, however, would not, in my opinion, bring so many men into the army as an addition to the soldier's pay; for, after all, this is merely a question of going to the labour market. This country boasts, and justly boasts, that it is the only country, except that great American Republic with which we are so intimately connected, in which there is no forced conscription. With the exception of Great Britain, there is not a single country in Europe, however small, where there is not a conscription. We are therefore obliged to go to the labour market in order to get men to serve the State, and men serve the State not so much for honour and glory or anything of that sort, as for the pounds, shillings, and pence which go into their pockets. They look to that more particularly. I feel satisfied that if one thing more than another would induce men to enter the army it is additional pay. This, of course, is entirely a question for the consideration of the Government. I am only giving my individual opinion upon it as a Member of your Lordships' House, and as holding a high position in the army. I think that the proposal for additional pay in preference to the other recommendations of the Commissioners is a sound and judicious one. At the same time, I am bound to say that some of the recommendations of the Commission are of the greatest possible value, and great advantages might be expected to result from their adoption. These are questions, however, which are not the main consideration. The question which I have to consider is this—"How am I to get the men I require for the army?" And my answer is that increased pay will bring the men more readily than anything else. If I had my choice, I should prefer giving the additional 2*d.* a day to those men who have served ten years; but then it should be recollected that men who have served that period will have 3*d.* a day more than at present, and to that extent the Government have gone beyond the recommendations of the Commission. My noble Friend thought that sufficient distinction had not been made between the raw material and the men who re-engaged after ten years' service, and he said there was a strong feeling in the army against the Ten Years Enlistment Act. I believe that that is the case, though certainly I myself entertain no strong objection to it, but, on the contrary, am prepared to support it to the fullest extent. At the same time, I am inclined to think that it does greatly increase our difficulties in enlisting for the army. In my opinion, when once a man makes up his mind to become a soldier he does not think about the length of time he will be required to serve. Whether the term of service be five, ten, fifteen, or twenty years does not much matter to him at that time; but when a man gets a little older and reflects upon his position, he begins to consider whether he shall re-engage or not. The reason why I prefer twelve to ten years is, not because I think it makes the slightest difference to the men on enlistment, but because it will enable men to look forward to a shorter period of re-enlistment. I do not in any way condemn the Ten Years Enlistment Act, though I think it has produced great difficulties in the army. In the first place, you want one-fourth more recruits than you did before, as only half the men re-engage after the expiration of their term of service. Now, as regards the illustrious Duke (the Duke of Wellington) who has been alluded to as having been a party to the first Limited Enlistment Act, I thought it right to look back and see what was said by that great statesman, who was always listened to by your Lordships with great attention. His opinion was, that as long as he was satisfied that the old soldiers would re-engage and remain in the army he should cordially support the Bill; but if he had thought that a contrary result would be produced by the Bill he should have opposed it. Now, my Lords, I stand upon exactly the same ground. I am aware that there are a great variety of opinions on this matter, and that there are some persons who not only regard the Ten Years Enlistment Act as a most satisfactory measure, but think that the principle of it ought to be extended. I must point out, however, that there has been a very considerable increase in the Army Estimates on account of the large number of ten years enlistment men whose term of service will expire this year, and whose places will have to be filled up by men who will receive bounties. The expenditure will be very large, while at the same time the efficiency of the regiments will be greatly lessened. My noble Friend has recommended a system of furloughs; but he must remember that for every man on unlimited furlough there must be a man enlisted to take his place; and that again will add to the expenditure of the country. As to the period of service in the army reserve, I should have preferred commencing with ten years; but as seven years has been recommended, I shall support the shorter period in order that the experiment may be tried. As regards the question of reserves a great difficulty has arisen. As you have not any kind of compulsion on the men, and dare not even re-introduce the ballot for the militia, how are you to get those 500,000 men referred to by my noble Friend for an army of reserve for this country? Of course, if they can be obtained I shall be the first to accept, with gratitude, the force thus placed at the disposal of the country. It will, however, involve so large an expenditure that I am at a loss to understand how to propose to raise so large a force. Now, what is a reserve force raised for? It is raised in order to make up the cadres of regiments. The whole question is one of the most difficult ones of the day. We have very small regiments and do not know how to increase them. My Lords, if we could raise our regiments to even 1,000 men per battalion that would give us something to commence with; and, in case of a war—should such a misfortune occur—we should be enabled to get on. I remember what occurred at the time of the last great war in which we were engaged—one in which I had the honour to take a share. Every regiment that went abroad at that time was found to be so weak in numbers that it had to call for volunteers. The 93rd called for volunteers from the 42nd and the 79th. But the 93rd had scarcely embarked when the 42nd was ordered out; and of course the latter had become so reduced in strength that it had to call for volunteers. This was done, and it received men from a regiment which almost immediately followed it. Those several regiments arrived at the Crimea about the same time, and there they were each with their own men serving in other regiments. I should be sorry to see such a state of things again, and the only way we can avoid it is by an army of reserve. I should prefer infinitely men who had served for seven or eight years in the army; but in this free country, unless you kept such men in your pay, you would have no hold on them. It is impossible to lay your hand upon any man except one who is actually a furlough man. In the militia, however, you have men who are bound to come together for training. It is stated that it is inadvisable to mix up the Line with the militia. Well I think it is not advisable to do so; and therefore I should not have recourse to this system if I could avoid it; but I do not see how we can avoid doing so, if we want an army of reserve. One objection made to the plan is that it would diminish the efficiency of the militia; but really I cannot see how this would be the result. One of the first things we did at the time of the last war was to call on the militia. Men and officers volunteered from the militia into the Line, and no doubt this would be the case in the event of another war. I think the effect of adding those additional men to the militia in time of peace would be calculated to increase rather than impair the efficiency of the militia. My Lords, we must all bear in mind that the question of finance—the question of expenditure—has to be considered in dealing with this matter; and when we view the plan of my right hon. Friend (General Peel) in connection with this question, I think we must arrive at the conclusion that it is the most advantageous that could be adopted on a very economical principle. I take it for granted that my right hon. Friend had good reason for bringing in the Supplementary Estimate for the reserve with that for the recruiting; but the cost of the reserve is to be only £50,000, and in return I am convinced it will do the State some service. In reference to some remarks which fell from my noble Friend (the Earl of Dalhousie) on the financial result of the proposed addition of 2d. to the pay of the men, I may observe that I have been told, and certainly understood, that the expenditure involved in the plan recommended by the Royal Commission far exceeded that which will be required to carry out the plan of Her Majesty's Government. I am not at all responsible for the decision on this point. It was a question for the War Department; but, on economical grounds, I believe that the proposal of the Government is a better mode of dealing with the matter than the one suggested by the Royal Commission. There is only one other point to which I feel it necessary to allude—that of the camps. Now, I believe that the objections to the camps in winter are a bugbear. Without intending any disrespect to the sister island I will ask any man whether such quarters as Mullingar, Fermoy, Templemore, and others which I might mention can be compared to Aldershot, a place within thirty miles of London, and from which an officer can come up to town in less than two hours. In fact, it is not a camp—it is a station. As for the men, they are better taken care of there than anywhere else. They have less duty there, and they have about 3 per cent sick. In fact, every attention is paid to their comfort and convenience. As to calling it a camp, in the ordinary sense of the word, my noble Friend must forgive me when I say that it is no such thing. In summer there may be some camp life there, but every man is well housed in winter. The huts for the officers may not be so comfortable—comparatively they are not so comfortable—as those of the men; and this is the reason why we hear so much about the matter. Do not let me be misunderstood. Do not let it be supposed that I think the officers' quarters ought not to be cared for, because I think quite the contrary. We have done an immensity for the men, and very little for the officers; and therefore I should be glad to see something done for the latter; but, at the same time, I must say that what is alleged against those camps, on the ground of their discomfort, is the greatest nonsense possible. It is a great error to suppose, either in one respect or the other, that the camp is not a place well suited for the purpose to which it is now applied. In conclusion, my Lords, I beg again to express my sense of the importance of this whole question, and to add that I think good results must follow from discussions such as we have had this evening.

The Duke of Cambridge

EARL GREY said, that having had an opportunity of fully explaining his views on the subject before the House in his evidence when examined by the Commissioners on Recruiting, he had not anticipated that there would be any occasion for his taking part in the present debate. But the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for War had devoted so much of his speech to an unsparing condemnation of the Act for Limiting the Term of Service in the Army which he (Earl Grey) had been responsible for recommending for their Lordships' adoption twenty years ago, that he felt bound to trouble the House with a few observations in vindication of a measure which he was still convinced was a wise one. The Act in question had two main objects; the first of these was to render the army more popular among the classes of the population which afforded the largest number of recruits; the next to endeavour to provide a means of increasing the effective strength of the army in the least possible time in the event of a war breaking out between this and any other country. In order to make the army popular it was necessary above all things to convince the friends and relatives of those desiring to enlist that it was for the advantage of their connections to enter the army. The inquiries which he made more than thirty years ago, when he first filled the office of Secretary at War, satisfied him that no small part of the unpopularity of the army arose from the belief on the part of parents that they would never again see their sons who enlisted. He found that this impression seriously affected the success of the recruiting sergeant. Owing to the long period of service then exacted, and the neglect of the most necessary measures of sanitary improvement, this belief was but too well founded, as a very small proportion of our soldiers in those days ever returned to their homes. But if men were enlisted at the age of eighteen, and were then enabled to come back after ten years' service, having received an efficient training in the meantime, not merely with the right of entering the army of reserve on terms of great advantage to them, but also with the assurance of commanding the best employment in civil life for which their training would have fitted them, it was reasonable to expect that the service would speedily become popular in every village. It was further contemplated by the authors of the Act that soldiers, at the end of their ten years' service, should be induced to accept their discharge on terms by which a hold would have been retained over them, so that the country at a moment's notice would be able to call them back to their old regiments for service at home, and thereby to strengthen their depôts and free the regular army for foreign service. These were the views which dictated the measure of 1847, which, according to the noble Earl, had proved a complete failure. He did not deny that it had failed to fulfil the expectations of its authors. But why? Simply because the plan as they intended it had never been tried. Unfortunately the officers of the army from the highest to the lowest had generally viewed the scheme with feelings of dislike, and had opposed to it a resistance which had effectually deprived it of all chance of success. In all professions, and in none more strongly than in the army, there was a dislike among those who had risen to eminence in it to depart from beaten paths. Now, the first requisite of any scheme was that a system of training should be established for the men, which would enable them not only to be more serviceable while in the army, but to earn a respectable living when they retired from it; the whole thing turned upon that. At the time he spoke of, it was well known that when a man of good character was discharged from the Sappers and Miners (and it was a rare exception to find a man of bad character in this corps, which was distinguished for its good conduct) he was perfectly certain to succeed in the labour market, and to obtain good employment in civil life, because the training he had undergone made his services so valuable. What had been done in the case of the Sappers and Miners might be done with the line; the soldiers of the line might receive the same training as the Sappers, which would not only ensure them good employment when discharged, but also render them far more valuable as soldiers; and this he said on no light authority. The First Napoleon stated over and over again, in his writings, and in his conversations at St. Helena, that in time of peace every soldier ought to be instructed not only in military drill, but in some industrial employment, and especially in the use of the spade and of entrenching tools. This, he said, was the practice of the Romans, who did not allow a soldier to take his place in the ranks of the legion till he was thoroughly instructed in this sort of labour as well as in the use of his weapons. This system Napoleon declared to deserve the imitation of every military nation, and spoke from his own experience of the great advantage of having soldiers skilled in civil labour. He said that the French Army in Egypt, having been raised at an early period of the French Revolution, included a large representation of skilled labour. Owing to this, when it was cut off from all communication with France by our superior naval force, the aptitude of the soldiers composing that army yet enabled it to provide for all its own wants, and to maintain themselves by the resources they created in the country. In the short interval afforded by the Peace of Amiens Napoleon pursued this system of industrial training, and the army with which he threatened us at Boulogne, and afterwards won the battle of Austerlitz, he declared to be the best he ever had, because it had undergone this educational process. In his later war he said he had far inferior armies, because the heavy demands for men did not allow time for the proper training of conscripts before they took the field. The policy recommended by the first Napoleon had been since followed to a great extent in the French army. He had himself some years ago had an opportunity of seeing in the camp then held at Boulogne a striking example of what could be accomplished by military labour; the huts, roads, gardens, everything connected with that encampment had been executed by the soldiers themselves, without any help from extraneous labour, as he was informed by the officers who very courteously showed him the establishment; and he understood that since the camp had been transferred to Chalons the same system had been followed. It had been found in France that not only was this system economical as regarded outlay, but that it was also attended with great advantage from providing healthy occupation, mental and bodily, for the men. But when we decided to form a camp everything was done for the soldier instead of by him; even such a matter as the draining of the ground was carried out by paid labourers, though it would have been a most useful piece of education for the soldiers to have executed the work. Up to the present moment not a single attempt had been made to introduce a system of industrial training for the army; but this was the most important proposal in the scheme of 1847, and he therefore denied that it could be said, with any correctness, to have been tried and to have failed. Then, again, instead of the ten years' men being encouraged to take their discharge, as was suggested in that scheme, every effort was made to retain them. The military authorities not understanding, as he supposed, that it was of the very essence of the scheme that soldiers should frequently return to their homes after a short service in the enjoyment of advantages which should induce others to enlist, had endeavoured, as far as possible, to induce men to re-enlist at the end of their first term of service, and had discouraged their entering into the reserve. This had arisen from the short-sighted fear of losing men from their regiments, as if it was not a gain instead of a loss to allow 100 men to leave the army after their ten years' service, provided that 500 men were thus encouraged to enlist in their place, and that the 100 men could still be fallen back upon in case of an emergency. For his own part, he still believed in the scheme of 1847, and only felt that it might well have gone a little further instead of stopping where it did. Before the Commission, he had earnestly recommended in his evidence, and in a letter which he had afterwards addressed to his noble Friend behind him, the Chairman of the Commission (the Earl of Dalhousie), that soldiers, instead of being persuaded to re-enlist, should, on the contrary, be afforded the utmost facilities for taking their discharge. He would not allow a man to take his discharge before the expiration of the first period of his service unless he enrolled himself as a soldier of reserve; but the very moment a man was declared to be thoroughly well acquainted with his profession and a really trained soldier, then he would permit him to take his discharge, if at home, on condition that he enrolled himself as a soldier of reserve; and he would not encumber these soldiers of reserve with many strict regulations; all that he would require of him would be that he should present himself at the nearest dépôt for one week in each year for training, in order that he might not forget the knowledge he had acquired, and in return for this he should be allowed to reckon two years in the reserve as equal to one in the ranks towards establishing his claim to pension. That limited period of training, he was convinced, was sufficient to prevent a soldier from forgetting what he had once learnt in the army. One other condition he would impose upon the soldier of reserve: that if a war with this country broke out, he should be liable at any time to serve with his own regiment, but at a double rate of pay, that is, at the same pay as was now allowed to the enrolled pensioners. Thus a number of trained soldiers would be really at command at the very time when they were most valuable; and when disbanded they would tend to make the service more popular. He was persuaded that such a system would draw numbers of men back to their standards and marvellously increase the army. He would remind their Lordships that under the present circumstances of the world—as was seen by the remarkable experience of Germany in the past year—the real danger of a country was encountered during the first fortnight of a war, and he insisted that this country, with the large armies now kept up on the Continent and modern facilities for suddenly moving large bodies of men, could not be safe unless it could throw into the ranks of the regular army a large reserve of trained soldiers within a fortnight of the breaking out of war. That was what the Prussians had found of immense value, what England would find of equal value, and what England could obtain by the means he had suggested. It had been said that the old soldier was invaluable in the army, and should not be parted with at any cost. It was quite true that it was of great importance that there should be a certain proportion of old soldiers in every regiment, and especially among the non-commissioned officers; but it was not less true that there was also a great advantage in having troops employed on active service mainly composed of men in the vigour of their age. Experience proved that the proportion of men fit to appear under arms was very much larger among the younger men than the older, because the ratio of sickness increased with age. Moreover, the older men either married or plunged into vice, and the illustrious Duke (the Duke of Cambridge) knew how inconvenient it was to have a number of married men in the army. If his views were sound, he thought it followed that recruiting for ten years' service was not so ill-advised a proposition as some supposed; but it was certain that one of two courses must be pursued—either the service must be made attractive or else the War Office must catch men as it could, and, having caught them, hold them to the last, and get everything possible out of them. The illustrious Duke had said these questions were all matters of money; he (Earl Grey) was prepared, however, at the proper time, to show that the adoption of his recommendations would cause no increase of expense, but, on the contrary, would tend to economy by reducing pensions and various charges to a larger amount than the new expenses it might create. At all events, he was sure it would be far more economical than the costly measure of direct increase of pay; and he agreed with the noble Lord who had introduced the question (the Earl of Dalhousie) that it would have been wiser, instead of giving that increase, to have relieved the soldier from some of those small charges which he regarded as grievances; because, in time, he would not think of the increase which he had received, but would still talk of his grievances, so that in the end the country would have both increased his pay and removed his grievance as well.

Earl Grey

THE DUKE OF CAMBRIDGE said he entirely concurred with the recommendation which had been thrown out of giving to the soldiers an industrial as well as military training; but so short was England of troops, so much were the soldiers moved about, that industrial occupation was out of the question for want of time. With reference to another matter he could assure his noble Friend that officers would be only too glad to avail themselves of what he had suggested, if they had the power.

THE EARL OF DALHOUSIE expressed his gratification at having been the means of bringing on the discussion of the evening; but he adhered to the opinion which he had expressed in the early portion of the evening, that the private soldiers regarded being kept at Aldershot during the winter as a great grievance. This operated as a serious drawback to enlistment in the army. The evidence which had been given before the Commission by private soldiers on this point had been given most readily, and without a moment's hesitation.

THE EARL OF LONGFORD apologized for having forgotten to say that no objection would be offered to the noble Earl's Motion.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at a quarter past Eight o'clock, till To-morrow, half past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, March 14, 1867.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—On Mines nominated.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—NAVY ESTIMATES [R.P.]

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Grand Juries (Ireland); Bankruptcy; Judgment Debtors*; Bankruptcy Acts Repeal*

First Reading—Grand Juries (Ireland) [73]; Bankruptcy [74]; Judgment Debtors* [75]; Bankruptcy Acts Repeal* [76].

Second Reading—Court of Chancery (Ireland) [47]; Lyon King of Arms (Scotland) [44].

Considered as amended—Oyster and Mussel Fisheries* [61].

Third Reading—Metropolitan Poor [66].

Earl Grey

BOARD OF TRADE REPORT ON PRIVATE BILLS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. STEPHEN CAVE said, it had been the practice of the Board of Trade to prepare Reports on the various Private Bills introduced into Parliament, and this involved considerable labour and occupied much valuable time in the office. The expense, too, was considerable, amounting last year to more than £300 for work done out of the office; besides the cost of printing and distribution, yet the Reports were usually consigned to the waste-paper basket without being looked at. The preparation of such Reports was not required by any Act of Parliament or Standing Order, except those which affected tidal-waters or harbours, which were reported upon under the Harbours Transfer Act of 1862. It was proposed, therefore, that henceforth these only should be reported upon. He would therefore move that the Board of Trade present to the House a Report on the following Bills, being all those which were of the character he had mentioned:—Swansea Valley and Harbour Junction Railway, Solway Junction Railway, Carnarvon and Llanberis Railway, Caledonian Railway (Forfarshire Works), North British Railway (Abandonment, &c.), Thames Embankment (Chelsea), Thames Subways, Paignton Water, Imperial Gas, Winestead Level Drainage, Gaslight and Coke Company, Witham Drainage, and Holderness Embankment and Reclamation.

Motion agreed to.

BANNS OF MATRIMONY.—QUESTION.

MR. MONK said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General, Whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the doubts which have arisen as to the proper period for the publication of Banns of Matrimony during the time of Morning Service, and to the diversity of practice consequent thereon; and, whether it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce any Measure for removing such doubts?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: The subject, Sir, is under the consideration of the Government, but the course to be taken has not yet been decided upon. If the hon. Member will repeat his question in the course of a week or ten days I hope to be enabled to give him an answer.

PARIS UNIVERSAL EXHIBITION. QUESTION.

MR. AKROYD said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the very incomplete state in which the British portion of the Paris Exhibition is now placed; and, whether he intends to have it completed in a manner worthy of the commercial dignity and importance of this Country?

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, he wished at the same time to know whether there is any reasonable expectation that the sum of £116,000, already voted, will be exceeded, and to what amount?

MR. HUNT: Sir, the question of the hon. Member for Halifax seems to imply that the Secretary to the Treasury has the direction of the works at the Paris Exhibition. I am happy to be able to state that that is not the case. I will, however, read a statement which has been made to the Government by the executive British Commissioner—

“The present incomplete state of the British portion of the Exhibition is necessarily so, because the work is not yet done, but is only in progress. At present the Exhibition is like a house which is not furnished, but it will be completed and properly decorated within the sum provided by the estimate, and on the 1st of April.”

That, I apprehend, is an answer to the hon. Member for Stoke (Mr. Beresford Hope). Since that Report was sent to the Privy Council I have also received a Report from the person in charge in Paris, who says—

“The English Exhibition is more advanced than that of any other nation, and it will be ready for opening on the 1st of April. The arrangement for the Exhibition of the objects is generally thought to be one that will give better opportunities of displaying them than the system adopted by any other country.”

MR. CRAWFORD: By whom is that signed?

MR. HUNT: By Richard Thompson.

REPRESENTATION OF SCOTLAND. QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether it is the purpose of the Government to bring before the House this Session a Reform Bill for the representation of Scotland; if so, whether the principles of representation to be adopted in the Reform Bill for England and Wales will be applied to Scotland; and whether any attempt will be made, to a greater or less extent, to adjust the number of Representatives in Scotland to the present wealth and population of the country?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill to Reform the Representation of Scotland; but when it will be introduced it is not in my power at the present moment to state. Probably in the course of a short time it may be in my power to give this information. With regard to the principles on which it will be framed, they will be the same as those we shall recommend for the representation of England; of course, with such alterations as the difference between the laws of the two countries shall render necessary. With regard to the question of increasing the representation of Scotland, I beg to say that subject is under our consideration. We are giving it our best consideration, and we shall decide that question upon its merits.

IRELAND—WATERFORD ELECTION. QUESTION.

MR. LAWSON said, he wished to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether he has taken any steps to investigate the two cases of Homicide which occurred at Dungarvan, and which formed the subject of the Coroner's Inquests held there; and, whether his attention has been called to the observations of Mr. Justice O'Hagan to the Grand Jury of Waterford upon that subject?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MORRIS) said, in reply, that two inquests were held at Dungarvan upon the bodies of two persons who met their deaths at the county of Waterford election. Those inquests were returned to the Crown Office, and through that office to the Crown solicitor of that circuit. On the 5th of February the depositions and the finding of the jury were laid before him, and on the 16th of February he gave instructions to the Crown Solicitor to the following purport:—

“Without coming to any conclusion as to the legal character of the homicides, I think every inquiry should be directed to ascertain by whom the homicides, or either of them, were caused, and of identifying the individuals. The Crown Solicitor should communicate with the county inspector of constabulary to ascertain if any faithworthy person can depose as to identity; he should also apply to the military authorities for the names of the soldiers engaged at Dungarvan, and if any faithworthy person comes forward, or can be found, who can identify the individual soldier or soldiers alleged to have caused the death of O'Brien or Keily, a communication should be made to the colonel of the regiment to have the soldiers who were at Dungarvan paraded for the purpose of identification."

He had received various communications from the Crown Solicitor subsequent to those instructions, and he felt satisfied that the Crown Solicitor had used every possible exertion to identify the individuals in question. With regard to the second branch of the question, Mr. Justice O'Hagan was reported in The Freeman's Journal newspaper to have said, in charging the grand jury on the 5th of March—

"There were two cases of homicide arising out of the late election, in one of which the jury had found a verdict of 'manslaughter,' and in the other a verdict of 'wilful murder.' Bills could not be sent up to them at the present assizes in either of those cases, the occurrence of which he deeply deplored, and trusted that the cause of them would be made the subject of searching investigation."

He thought it right to say that he attributed very little importance to the finding of the jury in one of these cases, in which they found a verdict of wilful murder. Although the counsel for the next of kin to the deceased closed an excited and exciting speech by demanding the highest verdict of the law, which was manslaughter, the jury, with a feeling of liberality which the learned Gentleman could not have imagined, actually found a verdict of wilful murder.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL.—QUESTION.

SIR CHARLES BRIGHT said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, If, as a portion of Greenwich Hospital has been granted to the Seamen's Hospital Society for seamen of the Mercantile Marine, the Government will also grant a portion of the unoccupied space, upon the same conditions, for a public hospital for the reception of sick and diseased persons belonging to the borough of Greenwich?

MR. DU CANE, in reply, said, it was perfectly true that the Government had sanctioned a loan of a portion of the unoccupied part of the Hospital to the Seamen's Hospital Society, the Government, however, reserving the power to resume it if, in the event of a naval war breaking out, or any other contingency, the accommodation was needed in the interest of the seamen of the Royal Navy. It was thought that the Mercantile Marine had a strong claim for some further direct share in the benefits of Greenwich Hospital, to the funds of which it had largely contributed. The Government, however, were unable to admit that a similar claim could be urged with equal justice by any portion of the community which had no direct connection with Greenwich Hospital, and which had never contributed to its resources. To divert any portion of the building of Greenwich Hospital to such a purpose would be to sanction the application of the building to purposes directly contrary to the intentions of its founders, and would materially enhance the difficulty which might arise if on any contingency the Government should think it necessary to regain possession of the unoccupied portion in the interest of the Royal Navy. And, therefore, however desirable an object in itself the establishment of a local hospital for the borough of Greenwich might be, he could hold out no hope to the hon. Member that the Government would ever be likely to sanction any appropriation of the building of Greenwich Hospital for such a purpose.

The Attorney General for Ireland

NAVY—CHAIN CABLES AND ANCHORS.

QUESTION.

MR. LAIRD said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether, as all the Chain Cables and Anchors manufactured in the Country are required, by the Act of 1864, to be tested to the Admiralty standard, the Board have terminated, or intend to terminate, the Contract between the Admiralty and Messrs. Brown, Lenox, and Co., and to open-up to the competition of respectable makers the future supply of Chain Cables and Anchors for Her Majesty's Service?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, in reply, that the contract with the Messrs. Brown, Lenox, and Co., with regard to cables, was only made in 1862, and the Admiralty had no intention to terminate it at this time. With respect to the contract for anchors, the usual notice would be given that it would not be renewed. As to the latter part of the hon. Member's Question, he had to reply that Her Majesty's service was so amply stored with anchors at this moment that he should be sorry to fetter the judgment of his successor on the subject of throwing open the future supply to competition.

COLONY OF BRITISH HONDURAS.

QUESTION.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he can communicate to the House any information with regard to the recent incursion of Indians into the Colony of Honduras, and to an action alleged to have taken place between them and a portion of the 3rd West India Regiment; and, whether his attention has been called to an extract from The Jamaica Gleaner, published in The Times newspaper of the second instant, containing serious imputations on the conduct of the English Officer in command on that occasion? He might explain that the imputation was that the Major in command, having about 150 troops under him, went into action with about fifty or 100 Indians, and beat a hasty retreat, leaving the ammunition, the medical stores, and the wounded behind him.

MR. ADDERLEY, in reply, said, a raid of Indians was made into British Honduras in December last, when great depredations were committed, and more than one British colonist was carried off for ransom. Upon that Lieutenant Governor Austin sent a Civil Commissioner with Major Mackay and some troops to the spot. The Indians were met, and a collision took place, but it appeared that both parties retreated. There is no report that the wounded of the West India regiment were left on the field. A statement had certainly been made to the Government reflecting very severely on the conduct of the English officers concerned; but he did not like to state anything more than, as only one side of the case had reached the Government. But the War Office at once commissioned Major General O'Connor, the commander of the Forces in Jamaica, to institute an inquiry into the matter. Lieutenant Governor Austin, immediately on hearing of the occurrence, applied for reinforcements from Jamaica. Sir John Grant instantly sent one detachment of troops, and followed soon afterwards himself with a second detachment. The report from Sir John Grant was that everything was now tranquil in the colony of British Honduras, and that there was an ample force of troops there to meet any exigency.

BOARD OF TRADE RETURNS.

QUESTION.

MR. GOSCHEN said, he would now beg to ask the Vice President of the Board of Trade, What is the reason of the delay which has occurred in the publication of the Board of Trade Returns for 1866, those Returns not having been in the hands of the public till the 1st of March of this year; and whether it is not possible to hasten the monthly Returns issued by the Board?

MR. STEPHEN CAVE: Sir, the accounts for the twelve months ended the 31st of December last were issued on the 2nd of this month; last year they were issued on the 27th of February. This delay of a day or two was occasioned by the necessity of a special reference between the Excise and Customs Departments. Generally speaking, the chief cause of delay is the difficulty of getting merchants to make complete entries and close their current accounts. If the same plan were followed with the annual as with the monthly Returns, of completing them on a certain day, without reference to outstanding accounts, something might be gained in time at the expense of accuracy; but then one year could not be compared with another. With regard to the monthly Returns, the growth of commerce makes their preparation a work of increasing labour. The Returns are received at the Custom House from all the hundred or more out-ports in a crude state, and have to be arranged, and their magnitude may be conceived from the fact that 1,000 entries are sometimes passed in a single day for a single article in one port alone, and that each monthly Return contains from forty to fifty pages of closely-printed calculations. The details have also been considerably extended for the purpose of giving the fuller information which the public have from time to time demanded. Formerly these Returns contained only totals; the monthly Returns now comprise values, and the countries of export and import of the principal articles, the aggregate of the expired months, and comparison for three years. The annual Returns contain the exporting and importing countries of every article, and a comparison of the trade with these countries for five years. The monthly Returns arrive at the Statistical Department of the Board of Trade about the 26th or 27th of the following month, and are kept there two days for the purpose of filling in the aggregates and printing. I doubt if this can be done more quickly. With regard to the annual Return, the only alteration I can think of besides that of issuing the inexact form I have mentioned would be to publish separately that portion which relates to home consumption, of which the accounts can be completed earlier than the rest. I can assure my right hon. Friend that no time is wasted, and that the Departments concerned endeavour to meet the natural wishes of the public as far as is practicable.

POSTAGE TO INDIA.—QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, If it is the intention of the Government to raise the rate of postage to India and the East, in consequence of an increase in the cost of the service?

MR. HUNT: Sir, it is intended to raise the postage to 9d., in consequence of the additional expense occasioned by the increased number of mails.

ENGINE DRIVERS' STRIKE.

QUESTION.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a statement which has appeared in the newspapers to the effect that the Engine Drivers of the London and Brighton Railway Company have given notice of their intention to strike; and whether, in the event of such strike taking place, he does not think the subject would be a fit one for being inquired into by the Commission on Trades Unions?

MR. WALPOLE, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the statement in question, and he had heard that there was considerable foundation for it. He had no doubt that the subject of such strikes would fall within the terms of the Commission, and that it would be inquired into by the Commissioners.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

INDIA, CHINA, AND AUSTRALIAN MAILS.

QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS said, that on a recent
Mr. Stephen Cave

occasion he had asked a Question relative to the tenders for the weekly postal service to and from Bombay. The reply was that notice had been given to the Peninsular and Oriental Company for the early termination of the contract for conveying the mail to India, but he did not understand whether it was intended to terminate the contract for the mail to China. He believed that the service to China would come absolutely to an end in January next. The service to Australia would be carried on on the basis of the present contract, which was subject to a notice of two years. He wished, therefore, to ask, Whether any arrangements would be made, in the event of the contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Company coming to an end, to continue the other two services, and whether any negotiations had been opened for the purpose of taking advantage of the French service, which was also connected with China?

MR. HUNT said, the Committee which sat upon our East Indian Mail Service, did not recommend notice to be given for the termination of the service between India and Australia at the same time. The paragraph in their Report relating to the subject was rather against the simultaneous termination of the two services. Her Majesty's Government had had the question under their consideration, whether they should give notice of their intention of terminating the contract between India and China and Australia at the same time. He had consulted the Chairman of the Committee on the subject. That Gentleman, who had given great attention to the subject, might be said to represent the views of the Committee, and he represented that it would be exceedingly unfortunate to postpone the establishment of the weekly mail to Bombay for two years. In consideration of the great desire of the trade that the weekly communication should commence as soon as possible, Her Majesty's Government had determined to give notice to terminate the Indian contract in the first instance. They had been partly induced to take that step without also terminating the Australian contract, because they thought the colonists themselves might desire to undertake the Australian service. Communications were now going on between the Colonial Office and the colonies with a view to some such arrangement. He believed that communications had taken place with the French Government, but nothing definite had yet been settled. Tenders for the new service had been prepared, and negotiations were going on with the India Office on the subject. The contract for the service east of Suez would lie with the India Government. The form of the tender had therefore been sent to them, and when it was received back it would be advertised.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he wished to ask, whether it was true that it was in contemplation to raise the postage on letters for India and the East generally, in order to meet the increased expenditure upon the re-adjustment of the services. He asked the Question because this was a point which had been particularly dealt with by the Committee, and the Committee had protested strongly against the adoption of any such measure, for reasons which were fully set out in their Report?

MR. HUNT said, it was determined, when the new postal service was commenced, to raise the postage to 9d. on the half-ounce letter, in order to meet the loss or increased expenditure expected to grow up through the increase in the number of the mails.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE— ELECTORAL STATISTICS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. LOCKE: I rise, Sir, to

"Call the attention of the House to the delay that has taken place in the production of the Papers on the subject of Reform, alluded to by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, which the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on Tuesday the 5th instant, said he hoped to be able to lay upon the Table of the House in a few days."

I wish to call the attention of the House to the uncertainty which exists with reference to the statistics which we were given to understand were prepared for the Cabinet, and which (a circumstance which naturally makes the House much more curious than it otherwise would have been) resulted in the retirement of three of the Members of the Cabinet. Two of those late Members of the Cabinet made statements in this House, and the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranbourne) said that certain papers were submitted to the Cabinet, containing the statistics, on the 23rd of February. On the 25th of February the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to make his statement to the House as to the Reform Bill which the Government were about to bring in; but on the 24th of February, in consequence of those statistics not being to the taste of the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, he sent in his resignation. Whether he did that on the 24th, which was Sunday, or on the 25th, I do not know. On the 25th, under these circumstances, of course the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not proceed with the statement on Reform which he had been about to introduce to the House, and which the House had expected. The right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel), and the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, made their statements, and it appeared that the papers referred to—whether placed in the hands of the Cabinet, or read out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—had only been partially communicated to the noble Lord and the other Members of the Cabinet at first, but subsequently the noble Lord had an opportunity of looking at them, or part of them—how much of them I do not know—and the result was his resignation. Therefore it was that I thought it right that such important documents as those which contained the statistics upon which the Reform Bill was to be brought in should be submitted to the House, that we, as well as the Cabinet, might have an opportunity of judging with respect to the measure which was to be based upon them. I therefore asked the right hon. Gentleman a question, and perhaps I had better repeat the exact words that were used, because very much in this matter appears to depend upon the precise words uttered by those who take part in the question. On the 5th of March my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) asked a question of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to what would be the course of public business, and I followed before an answer had been given to my hon. and learned Friend. I asked—

"When the papers referring to the electoral statistics, submitted to the Members of the Cabinet, and alluded to by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranbourne), would be laid upon the table?"—[3 Hansard, clxxxv. 1870.]

The right hon. Gentleman gave me this answer—

"I have given direction for the preparation of the papers, and I hope in a few days they will be in the hands of Members."—[3 Hansard, clxxxv. 1870.]

Now, I consider that answer was clear and distinct as to the identical papers alluded doubt if this can be done more quickly. With regard to the annual Return, the only alteration I can think of besides that of issuing the inexact form I have mentioned would be to publish separately that portion which relates to home consumption, of which the accounts can be completed earlier than the rest. I can assure my right hon. Friend that no time is wasted, and that the Departments concerned endeavour to meet the natural wishes of the public as far as is practicable.

POSTAGE TO INDIA.—QUESTION

MR. CRAWFORD said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury the intention of the Government as to the rate of postage to India in consequence of an increase of the service?

MR. HUNT: Sir, the noble Viscount having been laid on the table of the House, the rate of postage to India in consequence of an increase of the service?—[3 Hansard, clxxxv. 1648.]

ENGINE

MR. HUNT: Sir, the noble Viscount having been laid on the table of the House, the rate of postage to India in consequence of an increase of the service?—[3 Hansard, clxxxv. 1648.]

That struck me at the time as being an extraordinary statement, and so it appears to have struck the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman), because he made some observations upon it. It was stated likewise by the right hon. Gentleman—and this appears in the reports of the leading journals—that there was nothing new in the papers. That called up the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, and after the Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred to what had fallen from the right hon. Member for Stroud, the noble Lord observed—

“It is necessary, in order to make my own statement clear, that I should say that I understood, when certain figures were laid before the Cabinet, that they were figures which had been obtained from the Departments for that purpose, and that they were new. So I understood them; but, of course, in that I may have been mistaken. They were exceedingly scanty, and few in number, and the investigation of which I spoke was mainly directed to comparing these figures which were sums total with the more detailed information contained in the voluminous Returns laid before the House last year.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxv. 1649.]

It appears, then, that the right hon. Gen-

Mr. Locke

occasion he had asked to the tenders for the Exchequer vice to and from P. member for Stamford. The Chancellor and Or. says, in the first termination is asked to produce the mail are clearly designated stand containing the statistics nate aid before the Cabinet, or H. Cabinet, or partly read to the and which were subsequently ed to the noble Lord the Member Stamford, and which caused him to sign his office—the Chancellor of the Exchequer says most distinctly that he will produce those papers which contain those identical statistics. When his attention is again called to the matter about a week afterwards the right hon. Gentleman says, “No, there are no new papers at all. Those figures which you mentioned are merely figures which are now upon the table of the House, scattered amongst nobody can say how many Returns.” Whether that is so or not it is impossible for me to say; but, at all events, it appears that the noble Lord the Member for Stamford has not read the voluminous Returns amongst which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer says those figures are to be picked out. The noble Lord says that he understood that the figures submitted to him on that occasion were entirely new. I think the House has a right to have a clear explanation upon this matter. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had chosen to say, in the first place, “I do not intend to produce those statistics at all; it was a Cabinet matter. I introduced them to the Cabinet, but I am not going to introduce them to the House,” he might have done so, and the House could have dealt with the matter as under those circumstances. But the right hon. Gentleman distinctly said that the statistics should be produced, afterwards telling us that there were no new statistics to produce, although a late Member of the Cabinet distinctly says that there were, and that he understood the statistics shown to him to be new. I want to know, therefore, why it is that they have not been produced, and whether a satisfactory reason can be given by the right hon. Gentleman for not placing them on the table? It is necessary, for the satisfaction of the House, that such an explanation should be given as shall lead the House to a clear understanding of what was the real nature of the case.

*[March 14, 1867]
nothing / meant were about to be of February is not not being Member for*

ATHORNE HARDY: As my Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have to speak on another period, it is better, perhaps, to answer the Question of the noble Gentleman. The figures are this. The figures are indeed. My noble Friend the Viscount for his own totals among the figures which the noble Friend were already on the table of what is to say, the old figures in the different Returns were to show, as has been shown in newspapers, the number of male occupiers in the various boroughs. However, the papers will be in Members' hands shortly. It is necessary that they should be carefully corrected, and they have to come back from the printer's to be revised; but they will probably be in Members' hands to-morrow. The hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) and my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Harwich (Major Jervis) have moved for papers, which will also be supplied, and which will really put much more information into the hands of Members than the noble Lord the Member for Stamford had before him.

MR. GLADSTONE: There are two questions which I should like to put to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, not on exactly the same subject as the last Question, but in reference to the same chapter of information, and they refer to points which are very material for the convenience of the House. I should like to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Printing of the Reform Bill will be so expedited that it may be in the hands of Members on Tuesday morning? [THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Yes, it will.] That is very satisfactory. The other question I have to put is this: It will be recollected that in the blue book of last year there is a statement of the numbers of male occupiers, at different values of occupation, for every borough in the country. Those numbers include the persons who pay their own rates directly and those for whom the landlords pay rates, or who pay them in fact as part of the rent to their landlords. Those Returns draw no distinction between these two classes of persons, so that we have no ground upon which we can show how many of the occupiers are direct ratepayers, and how many are compound householders, or holders under Sturges Bourne's Act, or under the Small Tenements Act, or other Acts bearing upon the point. The question I want to put is one of great interest, and it is, whether the right hon. Gentleman will be prepared to lay before the House any information affecting the division of those two classes into direct ratepayers or compound householders for each of the boroughs in the country? I dare say the right hon. Gentleman will be able to answer this when he rises presently. Another point which I wish to mention is in reference to the procedure of this evening. Nothing would be more contrary to my own inclination, or to the inclination of my Friends around me, than to endeavour to interpose or intercept the progress of business; but, with reference to the proposal to enter into the discussion of the Navy Estimates to-night, the state of things is peculiar. The Navy Estimates of the present year are not common Navy Estimates; they involve a considerable increase of charge; and, besides that, they involve a considerable commutation of charge. They not only suspend certain descriptions of work now in progress, according to the plans of the late Government, according to the Estimates of last year, but they bring into view other descriptions of work of a very extensive character, and of very great importance; of such a description as to raise the whole question of supplying the naval stations abroad, and the whole question of the number of men to be voted for the navy. That being one of the material circumstances of the case, we have also this, that in the House of Commons to-night we neither have the Minister who prepared these Estimates (Sir John Pakington) to move them, nor the Minister under whose responsibility they are to be carried into effect (Mr. Corry). I trust that my noble Friend the present Secretary to the Admiralty (Lord Henry Lennox) will not suppose that I am impeaching his personal competence to propose the Navy Estimates. I have often heard him speak in this House, and I never heard him when he did not do great credit to himself and great justice to the subject he had charge of; but I speak of his position and responsibility with reference to this subject. It is within my knowledge that many Members on this side of the House wish to bring into full view, by the discussion on the Navy Estimates, which will necessarily be a long one, the various important subjects of which I have indicated the heads. In the form of the present Navy Estimates it is obviously impossible that this discussion can take place in the House unless in the presence of the responsible Minister. We are not situated as we were on the subject of the Army Estimates, where there was a special necessity for obtaining the Vote of Men with a view to the passing of the Mutiny Act. With regard to money, if there is any necessity for passing a Navy Vote on that head, a Vote can be passed on account to meet any emergency. Notice could be given of such a Vote to-night, and it could be voted to-morrow evening. With regard to the number of men, there will be an opportunity next week, in the interval between the introduction and the second reading of the Reform Bill, to introduce the Navy Estimates, and then the subject can be fully debated. I put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether it is for the convenience of the House that we should proceed with the statement of the noble Lord (Lord Henry Lennox) this evening. It is not necessary that we should object to the noble Lord making a statement, if the Government think the course of public business will be advanced by that. But it will be impossible for us to arrive at a Vote, as to the number of men, because the question turns upon and involves a number of matters which could not be dealt with except in the presence of the responsible Minister. Would it not, upon the whole, be for the convenience of the House that a day should be appointed, in the middle of next week, for the purpose of dealing with the Navy Estimates? I think I shall be justified in the suggestion I have thrown out by those who have given their minds to the subject and who have the intention of debating it.

MR. WHITE: I do not share in the interest which my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Locke) seems to attach to the production of further statistics on the subject of Reform—in fact, I would much rather that we should have less figures and more frankness. We have reason to complain, not so much of the want of information as of the want of straightforwardness. Much as I love statistics myself, I am afraid we have had a plethora of them upon this subject. I complain, in common with many of my brother Members around me, of the air of mystery—the un-English air of mystery—which has been indulged in by the Government in reference to this question. It was the remark of a distinguished statesman that a proper secrecy was the only mystery of able men, but that mystery was the only secrecy of weak and cunning ones. I do not say in which category the present Government may be placed; but if mystery be wisdom, they may be called pre-eminently wise. It was said some seventy years ago by the late Mr. Sheridan, that the English people had no faith in the “little Isaac” class of politicians—“roguish, but devilish keen.” I trust the Government will not persist in this policy of mystery, and render Mr. Sheridan’s remark applicable to them. In saying thus much, let me ask the hon. Gentlemen who sit on the Ministerial side of the House to accept the assurance that I believe the party to which I have the honour to belong would be benefited by a twelve months’ absence from office; and in that spirit I do not begrudge them the tenure of their pleasant places on the Benches opposite.

Mr. Gladstone

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not intend, Sir, to trouble the House with any remarks upon the observations of the successor to Sheridan. With regard to the inquiry of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), I must say I consider it unreasonable. He himself was a Member of a Government which for seven years regulated the destinies of this country, and during those seven years the Navy Estimates were always moved by the Secretary of the Admiralty (Lord Clarence Paget). We did not hear then that it was unsatisfactory to the House that the First Lord of the Admiralty should not be present, or that the Minister of the Admiralty, who is responsible for the preparation of the Estimates, should not be a Member of this House. If therefore, Sir, the Navy Estimates could be moved by the Secretary of the Admiralty for seven years I cannot understand the grounds of the objections taken upon this occasion, more especially as my noble Friend the present Secretary (Lord Henry Lennox) is so perfectly competent to the task. The right hon. Gentleman asks me whether the public business would be retarded or inconvenienced by the adoption of the course which he has suggested. In answer to that I have to say that considering that the First Lord of the Admiralty (if his presence be absolutely necessary to move the Estimates) cannot take his seat until the 25th of this month, I have no hesitation in saying that the course proposed would be most inconvenient to the course of public business, and would, moreover, seriously embarrass certain arrangements which have been made. The right hon. Gentleman talks much of the presence of the Minister of the Admiralty, who is responsible for the preparation of the Estimates. I have already shown to the House that it is not absolutely necessary that the First Lord of the Admiralty should move the Estimates; because for the last seven years this has not been done. But allow me, Sir, to remark that every Minister is responsible for the preparation of these Estimates. What was our proposal with respect to the business this evening? We proposed that the Estimates should be moved by the Secretary of the Admiralty; but when we made that arrangement it was thought that my noble Friend the Secretary would, according to all calculation and expectation, have had by his side my right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington), the late First Lord of the Admiralty, who would have been prepared also to have spoken upon any subject which the House might think required elucidation. An accident, the non-return of the writ, has prevented this proposal being carried out. I repeat, that when the objection was taken, notice of which, owing to the courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, was given us, the presence of my right hon. Friend the late First Lord of the Admiralty was certainly counted upon. Nobody, in fact, doubted that he would be present. I must say, therefore, that I do not see in the tone taken by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) upon this subject, exactly that temper which I should have counted upon, whatever might have been the struggles of party, with reference to the better conduct of the public business. Let me remind the right hon. Gentleman, that if no objection had been taken on the first night on which my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) was prepared to move the Army Estimates, if he had been permitted to go on then, my right hon. Friend the then First Lord of the Admiralty (Sir John Pakington) would on the Thursday following have moved the Navy Estimates, and we should not have been in the somewhat embarrassing position in which the House is now placed. I am perfectly aware that if hon. Gentlemen, acting from what they consider to be their duty, choose to control the necessary business of this House, it is impossible for us to resist an appeal of that sort, because Motion after Motion can be made. I think it undesirable that the Estimates should be moved unless there is a general concurrence in the House upon the subject. My opinion is, that it will be convenient for the public service that we should proceed as the paper indicates, but I must leave it to the House to decide.

SIR GEORGE GREY: The right hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the objection of my right hon. Friend. He did not mean to imply that the Estimates should never be moved by the Secretary of the Admiralty. When the First Lord of the Admiralty does not sit in this House, the Secretary is the recognised organ of the Department. His objection was, that it is unusual and inexpedient for him to move the Estimates when he is not the recognised organ of the Admiralty. When the First Lord has a seat in this House, it is he who should give the necessary explanations of matters of importance which may arise in the course of the debate. The right hon. Gentleman opposite seems to admit the force of that objection, because he says that he had counted upon the presence of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War (Sir John Pakington.) If that right hon. Gentleman had taken his seat, there would have been no objection to proceeding with the Estimates, because he is the Minister who is directly responsible to the House for their preparation, and could no doubt have given every explanation that was required. No one, I am sure, will doubt the competency of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Henry Lennox) to deal with this subject. The House will be happy to hear his statement if the right hon. Gentleman thinks that his making it to-night will advance the public business; but he must not expect that a debate can be taken as if the First Lord of the Admiralty or the Secretary of State for War were in their places, or that any Vote, except on account, can be agreed to.

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Sir, it is so unusual a circumstance for me to find myself the subject of a debate in this House, that perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words with reference to what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with his usual kindness, has wished to press my statement upon the House to-night. I was willing to make that statement, and should, under any circumstances, have prefixed it with an apology to the House that a person occupying so humble a position as I do should move such important Estimates as these. If the Opposition, led by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), had, out of regard for the state of public business, been willing to allow me to make my statement, and to follow it up by practical action in the shape of a Vote for the number of men, I was ready to undertake a task the magnitude of which no one who has not attempted to perform it can appreciate, especially when it is undertaken, as I may be allowed to say I have undertaken it, at three day's notice. Under the circumstances, however, I must respectfully decline to make a statement which is not to be followed by any practical action of the Committee. In conclusion, I have only to state that when my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Corry) who will, I hope, be returned to the House in the course of next week—he having been eight years away from the Department over which he now presides, during which time matters have greatly changed—I may, perhaps, from the experience which I have gained in the last eight months, be able to be of some use to him. At all events, I shall be delighted to give to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire and his Friends any assistance that I can to elucidate the items of the Votes.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise for the purpose of explanation. I made no objection to the statement of my noble Friend (Lord Henry Lennox) being made if it were considered necessary or convenient by the Government. But I must point out that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not answered the rather important questions I put to him.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I think the first question was whether the Reform Bill would be in the hands of Members on Tuesday? Certainly, I believe it will. I have no doubt of it. The second question was, as to the distinction between the £10 householders—those who were rated and those who paid by their landlords. My impression is that such a statement can be made out. I will communicate with my right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Gathorne Hardy), and will give the information if possible.

Lord Henry Lennox

MR. OSBORNE: I should be very sorry that it should go forth that this side of the House is unanimously of opinion that the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty should not be permitted to proceed with the Navy Estimates, and take a Vote to-night. It appears to me that the public out of doors will not be satisfied unless the Navy Estimates are brought forward. Due notice has been given. My noble Friend the Secretary of the Admiralty (Lord Henry Lennox) is the recognised organ of the Government on the subject, and the First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Corry) cannot possibly take his place in this House till Monday. [Sir GEORGE GREY: The discussion will all come over again.] But why not give the Government a Vote on Account of the Navy Estimates this evening? We know that subordinates in this House are generally so sat upon by their superior officers that they have seldom a chance given them of showing their talents. The ability for perspicuity of statement possessed by my noble Friend is recognised by all. I am sorry, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has on this occasion displayed such squeezable materials, and I think the House will do well to allow my noble Friend to make his statement, and, if necessary, to take a Vote on Account. We shall then be expediting the public business; at all events, we shall not be putting the country to any inconvenience. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will put the noble Lord up, and that we shall go into the Navy Estimates forthwith.

MR. HORSMAN: I think there is some misunderstanding as to the course intended to be taken by the Government, and as to what is the objection of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone.) It is very reasonable that the noble Lord should be permitted to make his statement and take a Vote on Account. If that is the intention of the Government no objection ought to be raised. But I understood the objection of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire to be that the statement ought not to be followed by taking the Vote for the Wages of the Men, which would involve the whole policy of the Estimates. That, of course, opens a large question, and I think it may fairly be considered by the Government whether in the absence of their recognised organ in this House it ought to be pressed forward to-night.

LORD HENRY LENNOX: If, Sir, I am allowed to make my statement, and carry forward the Estimates as far as I can in the same position and under the same conditions as if the First Lord of the Admiralty was, like the late First Lord, a Member of the House of Peers, I am quite willing to go into the discussion; but I must respectfully decline to make any statement on sufferance.

MR. STANSFELD: The noble Lord is labouring under some misapprehension. I can assure him that so far as my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone), and all of us on this Bench are concerned, we are most desirous that he should make his statement. Our difficulty is this. The House is aware that when the Vote for Wages has been passed it is not competent to any Member to discuss questions of general policy. Now, there are a number of us, some upon this Bench, and some sitting behind us, who are anxious to discuss general questions arising out of the policy of naval administration. We do not doubt the ability of the noble Lord to deal with those questions or to reply to us; but we should like to hear the views of the late First Lord of the Admiralty, as some of us may have something to say upon them. Therefore, it is not so much the absence of the present First Lord as that of the right hon. Gentleman who was First Lord when the Estimates were prepared, that leads us to hope that the Government will, at any rate, consent not to take a Vote for Wages to-night, and will give us the fair opportunity of discussing the policy of the Admiralty, of which they ought not to seek to deprive us.

SIR HENRY EDWARDS: Should the suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer be adopted by the House, we may have to wait till the end of the Session before an opportunity offers to discuss these Estimates, in the event of the first Lord of the Admiralty not being returned by his late constituency. The course taken by the Opposition appeared to him to have but one interpretation, and should the noble Lord be prevented making his statement on that occasion the country would believe that the delay was caused by factious opposition. At the beginning of the Session the House was given to understand by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire that every possible effort would be made by those who sat on the other side of the House to assist the Government in carrying on the public business. But what had occurred since that assurance was given? Every measure brought forward by the Government had been, more or less, objected to. An objection was raised to the late Secretary for War (General Peel) bringing forward the Army Estimates, and now a similar objection was raised to the Navy Estimates being introduced by the noble Lord. After the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) upon this occasion the country would come to the conclusion that nothing was to pass this Session which the right hon. Gentleman and those who thought with him could possibly prevent being carried. He was much pleased to hear some time since the unanimous cheer from below the gangway when it was announced that the Government was to have fair play. He repeated, that if the House was prevented from going into the Navy Estimates that night, it would go forth to the country that those who sat opposite were the real obstructives, while those on the Government side of the House were doing their utmost to forward public business.

MAJOR JERVIS said, that there was a great difference between the case of the late Secretary for War introducing the Army Estimates and the present Secretary to the Admiralty moving the Navy Estimates. The House was willing that the right hon. Gentleman should explain the Army Estimates, which had been prepared under his directions, but he took no Vote for Men on that occasion. Taking into consideration the present state of the country and of Europe, he thought it unadvisable that any Vote should be taken in the absence of the present and the late First Lords of the Admiralty which would preclude future discussion upon important questions relating to the administration of the navy. He therefore hoped, if the noble Lord made his statement that night, detailing the general scheme and plan of the Government in reference to the administration of the navy, that no Vote for Wages would be taken.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had last spoken had inadvertently fallen into an error when he stated that his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon had not been permitted to take a Vote for Men on the evening when he moved the Army Estimates. His right hon. and gallant Friend did take a Vote for the number of Men. He did not see why any questions in connection with the administration of the navy hon. Gentlemen wished to discuss could not be brought on that evening, notwithstanding the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty. As his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had already observed, for several years questions of the first importance in reference to the navy had been always discussed in the absence of the First Lord of the Admiralty, who with the Secretary for War had sat in the other House. It therefore appeared to him that whether the matter was looked at in the light of constitutional practice or of convenience to individual Members, there was nothing to prevent Her Majesty's Government from proceeding with the public business, and of taking a Vote in the ordinary course. He thought that the public convenience would be best consulted by the House permitting the noble Lord to make his statement.

MR. SANDFORD said, he wished to suggest that the noble Lord should adopt a medium course by making his statement, but not taking a Vote that would preclude subsequent discussion. Could not a Vote on Account be taken?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: I am sorry to be again obliged to trouble the House, or to appear unyielding, but in answer to the question of my hon. Friend I have to point out that the discussion of those questions would not be in the least degree less open if I moved these Estimates than it would be if they were introduced by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Corry). I must most emphatically say that I can only consent to move the Estimates to-night on the same conditions as if my Chief was in the other House of Parliament.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon had prepared the Army Estimates which he had introduced, and therefore he was perfectly competent to give any detailed explanations which the House might require. But the First Lord of the Admiralty was not present to answer questions which hon. Gentlemen might wish to put to him on the subject of the naval administration. He therefore trusted that the noble Lord would not take any step which would prevent future discussion upon the subject.

Lord John Manners

MR. HENRY BAILLIE said, he hoped that the Government would not bind themselves to follow the course of action dictated by hon. Gentlemen opposite. The course for Government to pursue was to bring forward their Estimates and to move a Vote for the number of Men. If hon. Gentlemen opposite thought proper to oppose the Vote for the number of Men they could do so.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Mr. Dodson—I hardly know exactly the position in which I stand. I thought that the Order for going into Committee of Supply was discharged, and that, consequently, the House would proceed with the consideration of other business; but I now see that Mr. Speaker has left the Chair, and I am told that for the sake of the public convenience I am bound to make a statement and move the Navy Estimates for the year. In making that statement I must, in a special manner, claim the indulgence and the clemency of this Committee, who I do not doubt will take into consideration the very short time I have had since I received notice from Her Majesty's Government that, in consequence of the state of public business, it was desirable that I should undertake this most onerous task. Before I plunge, so to speak, into the various Votes which form the Estimates for the year, I will give the Committee a short epitome of the sums required for the Naval Service last year, comparing them with those which we ask the Committee to grant for the present year, and will allude to the salient points in which the present Estimates differ from those of last year. In the year 1866-7 my gallant Predecessor and Relative, Lord Clarence Paget, asked the Committee to vote the sum of £10,434,735, and at a later period of the Session Four Supplementary Votes were added, amounting, in round numbers, to £46,500. One of these was an additional charge for an improved system of retirement for officers of the Royal Navy.

Another was for the first three months' increased pay of the medical officers of the navy. The remaining sums were for the first instalment for building of a turret ship by Captain Cowper Coles, and the sum expended for completion of Her Majesty's ship Northumberland. Now, the sum which I shall ask the Committee to vote for 1867-8 is £10,926,253, being an excess of £545,000 over the original Estimate of last year, and of £491,518 over the whole sum voted in 1866-7, including the Supplementary Estimates for the Navy. The Committee must not for a moment imagine that the whole of that sum is required for the Effective Service of the Navy. The impression which has prevailed of late years, that the whole amount which is annually to be found in the Estimates is required for the service of the Navy, is an entirely erroneous one. For the Effective Service of the Navy there is this year required a sum of £9,067,758, that being an increase of £480,260 over the Effective Services of last year. For the Non-effective Services there is required a sum of nearly £2,000,000, and that includes many items over which the Board of Admiralty can exercise no control. There is, for instance, an item for the increase of half-pay and pensions, which, depending as it does upon casualties of life and health, are beyond our control. Then there is the Transport Department, the control of which rests with the War Office, for they alone decide what troops shall be sent out, and where and when they shall be sent, nothing being left to the Admiralty but to carry out those orders. From this cause, as may be imagined, the head of the Transport Department finds it very difficult to give any accurate Estimate at the commencement of the year of what sum will be required, the demand for transports being liable to change, from various causes, and to special and unforeseen demands arising from time to time. Another item of an exceptional nature is the sum of £50,000, being the first moiety of £100,000 towards the building of a two-turreted ship for the colony of Victoria. This, I need hardly say, was a question of colonial policy, and was granted because it was thought advisable to encourage that colony in spirit of self-reliance in its own defences for the future by assisting in providing it with such a vessel. Another £50,000 will accordingly appear among the Miscellaneous Estimates next year. I will now proceed to draw the attention of the Committee to the salient points of difference between the present and last year's Estimates. The principal increase in these Estimates is the excess of £528,000 over last year in Vote 10 section 2; but against this increase must be put a reduction of £175,000 in the Storekeeper General's Department. Before going into detail on these matters, I may remark generally that almost every Vote shows an increase, great or small, and I must ask the Committee to remember how difficult it is to prevent such an increase. When the national wealth is every day increasing, when every class of the community is raising itself in the social scale, and when costly inventions, both in shipbuilding and gunnery, are continually being made, it is almost impossible to keep the amount of expenditure within the limit of former Estimates. I can only assure the Committee that the most careful attention has been given to the subject by the Board of Admiralty, under the presidency of my right hon. Friend the present Secretary for War (Sir John Pakington), and no sensible increase in any Vote has been admitted without the closest examination and the most careful scrutiny. It will no doubt be interesting to the Committee to know the exact number of ships which the country had in commission at the time the Estimates were framed, and I have before me a list showing that that number was 154. The first Vote which I shall have to bring before the House, and which I am surprised to hear is likely to give rise to much controversy, states that the number of seamen, boys, and coastguardmen, required for the service of the year, is 51,683, and this shows a reduction of 285 officers and men over the number taken in 1866-7. The reduction among the commissioned officers is 134, and is the result of an arrangement made some sixteen months ago by the late Board of Admiralty with regard to the engineers. There is also a small diminution in the number of subordinate officers. The reduction in the number of commissioned officers is, as I have said, due to an arrangement arrived at sixteen months ago by the Board of Admiralty for stopping the entry of engineers, and was come to in consequence of the great number of those officers in that service. The reduction in the number of subordinate officers is owing to a Minute suggested by one of the most distinguished Members—indeed, I may doubt if this can be done more quickly. With regard to the annual Return, the only alteration I can think of besides that of issuing the inexact form I have mentioned would be to publish separately that portion which relates to home consumption, of which the accounts can be completed earlier than the rest. I can assure my right hon. Friend that no time is wasted, and that the Departments concerned endeavour to meet the natural wishes of the public as far as is practicable.

POSTAGE TO INDIA.—QUESTION.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, If it is the intention of the Government to raise the rate of postage to India and the East, in consequence of an increase in the cost of the service?

MR. HUNT: Sir, it is intended to raise the postage to 9d., in consequence of the additional expense occasioned by the increased number of mails.

ENGINE DRIVERS' STRIKE. QUESTION.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a statement which has appeared in the newspapers to the effect that the Engine Drivers of the London and Brighton Railway Company have given notice of their intention to strike; and whether, in the event of such strike taking place, he does not think the subject would be a fit one for being inquired into by the Commission on Trades Unions?

MR. WALPOLE, in reply, said, his attention had been called to the statement in question, and he had heard that there was considerable foundation for it. He had no doubt that the subject of such strikes would fall within the terms of the Commission, and that it would be inquired into by the Commissioners.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

INDIA, CHINA, AND AUSTRALIAN MAILS.

QUESTION.

MR. CHILDERS said, that on a recent
Mr. Stephen Cave

occasion he had asked a Question relative to the tenders for the weekly postal service to and from Bombay. The reply was that notice had been given to the Peninsular and Oriental Company for the early termination of the contract for conveying the mail to India, but he did not understand whether it was intended to terminate the contract for the mail to China. He believed that the service to China would come absolutely to an end in January next. The service to Australia would be carried on on the basis of the present contract, which was subject to a notice of two years. He wished, therefore, to ask, Whether any arrangements would be made, in the event of the contract with the Peninsular and Oriental Company coming to an end, to continue the other two services, and whether any negotiations had been opened for the purpose of taking advantage of the French service, which was also connected with China?

MR. HUNT said, the Committee which sat upon our East Indian Mail Service, did not recommend notice to be given for the termination of the service between India and Australia at the same time. The paragraph in their Report relating to the subject was rather against the simultaneous termination of the two services. Her Majesty's Government had had the question under their consideration, whether they should give notice of their intention of terminating the contract between India and China and Australia at the same time. He had consulted the Chairman of the Committee on the subject. That Gentleman, who had given great attention to the subject, might be said to represent the views of the Committee, and he represented that it would be exceedingly unfortunate to postpone the establishment of the weekly mail to Bombay for two years. In consideration of the great desire of the trade that the weekly communication should commence as soon as possible, Her Majesty's Government had determined to give notice to terminate the Indian contract in the first instance. They had been partly induced to take that step without also terminating the Australian contract, because they thought the colonists themselves might desire to undertake the Australian service. Communications were now going on between the Colonial Office and the colonies with a view to some such arrangement. He believed that communications had taken place with the French Government, but nothing definite had yet been settled. Tenders for the new service had been prepared, and negotiations were going on with the India Office on the subject. The contract for the service east of Suez would lie with the India Government. The form of the tender had therefore been sent to them, and when it was received back it would be advertised.

MR. CRAWFORD said, he wished to ask, whether it was true that it was in contemplation to raise the postage on letters for India and the East generally, in order to meet the increased expenditure upon the re-adjustment of the services. He asked the Question because this was a point which had been particularly dealt with by the Committee, and the Committee had protested strongly against the adoption of any such measure, for reasons which were fully set out in their Report?

MR. HUNT said, it was determined, when the new postal service was commenced, to raise the postage to 9d. on the half-ounce letter, in order to meet the loss or increased expenditure expected to grow up through the increase in the number of the mails.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE— ELECTORAL STATISTICS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. LOCKE: I rise, Sir, to

"Call the attention of the House to the delay that has taken place in the production of the Papers on the subject of Reform, alluded to by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, which the right hon. the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on Tuesday the 5th instant, said he hoped to be able to lay upon the Table of the House in a few days."

I wish to call the attention of the House to the uncertainty which exists with reference to the statistics which we were given to understand were prepared for the Cabinet, and which (a circumstance which naturally makes the House much more curious than it otherwise would have been) resulted in the retirement of three of the Members of the Cabinet. Two of those late Members of the Cabinet made statements in this House, and the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranbourne) said that certain papers were submitted to the Cabinet, containing the statistics, on the 23rd of February. On the 25th of February the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was to make his statement to the House as to the Reform Bill which the Government were about to bring in; but on the 24th of February, in consequence of those statistics not being to the taste of the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, he sent in his resignation. Whether he did that on the 24th, which was Sunday, or on the 25th, I do not know. On the 25th, under these circumstances, of course the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer did not proceed with the statement on Reform which he had been about to introduce to the House, and which the House had expected. The right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel), and the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, made their statements, and it appeared that the papers referred to—whether placed in the hands of the Cabinet, or read out by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—had only been partially communicated to the noble Lord and the other Members of the Cabinet at first, but subsequently the noble Lord had an opportunity of looking at them, or part of them—how much of them I do not know—and the result was his resignation. Therefore it was that I thought it right that such important documents as those which contained the statistics upon which the Reform Bill was to be brought in should be submitted to the House, that we, as well as the Cabinet, might have an opportunity of judging with respect to the measure which was to be based upon them. I therefore asked the right hon. Gentleman a question, and perhaps I had better repeat the exact words that were used, because very much in this matter appears to depend upon the precise words uttered by those who take part in the question. On the 5th of March my hon. and learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) asked a question of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to what would be the course of public business, and I followed before an answer had been given to my hon. and learned Friend. I asked—

"When the papers referring to the electoral statistics, submitted to the Members of the Cabinet, and alluded to by the noble Lord the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranbourne), would be laid upon the table?"—[3 Hansard, clxxxv. 1370.]

The right hon. Gentleman gave me this answer—

"I have given direction for the preparation of the papers, and I hope in a few days they will be in the hands of Members."—[3 Hansard, clxxxv. 1370.]

Now, I consider that answer was clear and distinct as to the identical papers alluded to by the noble Lord. There could be no doubt about the question, and none of the public journals, I believe, differ in any way upon it or upon the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman. From that it was fair to infer that directions had been given—there could be no question at all about preparing the papers, which were all ready—that directions had been given by the right hon. Gentleman to produce the papers for the satisfaction of the House, and that they would be laid upon the table at once. However, they did not appear; and therefore it was that, on the 11th of March, I renewed my Question to the right hon. Gentleman, asking him—

“Whether the Government would lay on the table the statistics referred to by the noble Viscount (Viscount Cranbourne) as having been laid before the Cabinet a fortnight since?”—[3 Hansard, clxxxv. 1848.]

This was the right hon. Gentleman's answer—

“No papers have been before the Cabinet which have not been laid on the table of the House. There is no new information. I believe that the House is in possession of all the information the Cabinet have. I have given instructions that for the convenience of Members certain information shall be prepared and printed, but I regret that it is not yet ready. I am unable to account for the delay, but I will make inquiry as to the reason. It has probably arisen from the desire to impart some new information.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxv. 1848.]

That struck me at the time as being an extraordinary statement, and so it appears to have struck the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stroud (Mr. Horsman), because he made some observations upon it. It was stated likewise by the right hon. Gentleman—and this appears in the reports of the leading journals—that there was nothing new in the papers. That called up the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, and after the Chancellor of the Exchequer had referred to what had fallen from the right hon. Member for Stroud, the noble Lord observed—

“It is necessary, in order to make my own statement clear, that I should say that I understood, when certain figures were laid before the Cabinet, that they were figures which had been obtained from the Departments for that purpose, and that they were new. So I understood them; but, of course, in that I may have been mistaken. They were exceedingly scanty, and few in number, and the investigation of which I spoke was mainly directed to comparing these figures which were sums total with the more detailed information contained in the voluminous Returns laid before the House last year.”—[3 Hansard, clxxxv. 1849.]

It appears, then, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the noble Lord the Member for Stamford are at direct variance. The Chancellor of the Exchequer says, in the first instance—when he is asked to produce the papers, which are clearly designated as the papers containing the statistics which were laid before the Cabinet, or read to the Cabinet, or partly read to the Cabinet, and which were subsequently submitted to the noble Lord the Member for Stamford, and which caused him to resign his office—the Chancellor of the Exchequer says most distinctly that he will produce those papers which contain those identical statistics. When his attention is again called to the matter about a week afterwards the right hon. Gentleman says, “No, there are no new papers at all. Those figures which you mentioned are merely figures which are now upon the table of the House, scattered amongst nobody can say how many Returns.” Whether that is so or not it is impossible for me to say; but, at all events, it appears that the noble Lord the Member for Stamford has not read the voluminous Returns amongst which the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer says those figures are to be picked out. The noble Lord says that he understood that the figures submitted to him on that occasion were entirely new. I think the House has a right to have a clear explanation upon this matter. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer had chosen to say, in the first place, “I do not intend to produce those statistics at all; it was a Cabinet matter. I introduced them to the Cabinet, but I am not going to introduce them to the House,” he might have done so, and the House could have dealt with the matter as under those circumstances. But the right hon. Gentleman distinctly said that the statistics should be produced, afterwards telling us that there were no new statistics to produce, although a late Member of the Cabinet distinctly says that there were, and that he understood the statistics shown to him to be new. I want to know, therefore, why it is that they have not been produced, and whether a satisfactory reason can be given by the right hon. Gentleman for not placing them on the table? It is necessary, for the satisfaction of the House, that such an explanation should be given as shall lead the House to a clear understanding of what was the real nature of the case.

Mr. Locke

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: As my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have to speak on another subject at a later period, it is better, perhaps, that I should answer the Question of the hon. and learned Gentleman. The real fact of the matter is this. The figures spoken of were very few indeed. My noble Friend the Member for Stamford (Viscount Cranbourne) analysed them for his own purposes, and divided the totals among the different boroughs. The figures which were given to my noble Friend were derived from papers already on the table of the House; that is to say, the old figures obtained in the different Returns were arranged to show, as has been shown in the newspapers, the number of male occupiers in the various boroughs. However, the papers will be in Members' hands shortly. It is necessary that they should be carefully corrected, and they have to come back from the printer's to be revised; but they will probably be in Members' hands to-morrow. The hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Whalley) and my hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Harwich (Major Jervis) have moved for papers, which will also be supplied, and which will really put much more information into the hands of Members than the noble Lord the Member for Stamford had before him.

MR. GLADSTONE: There are two questions which I should like to put to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, not on exactly the same subject as the last Question, but in reference to the same chapter of information, and they refer to points which are very material for the convenience of the House. I should like to know from the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Printing of the Reform Bill will be so expedited that it may be in the hands of Members on Tuesday morning? [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: Yes, it will.] That is very satisfactory. The other question I have to put is this: It will be recollected that in the blue book of last year there is a statement of the numbers of male occupiers, at different values of occupation, for every borough in the country. Those numbers include the persons who pay their own rates directly and those for whom the landlords pay rates, or who pay them in fact as part of the rent to their landlords. Those Returns draw no distinction between these two classes of persons, so that we have no ground upon which we can show how many of the occupiers are direct ratepayers, and how many are compound householders, or holders under Sturges Bourne's Act, or under the Small Tenements Act, or other Acts bearing upon the point. The question I want to put is one of great interest, and it is, whether the right hon. Gentleman will be prepared to lay before the House any information affecting the division of those two classes into direct ratepayers or compound householders for each of the boroughs in the country? I dare say the right hon. Gentleman will be able to answer this when he rises presently. Another point which I wish to mention is in reference to the procedure of this evening. Nothing would be more contrary to my own inclination, or to the inclination of my Friends around me, than to endeavour to interpose or intercept the progress of business; but, with reference to the proposal to enter into the discussion of the Navy Estimates to-night, the state of things is peculiar. The Navy Estimates of the present year are not common Navy Estimates; they involve a considerable increase of charge; and, besides that, they involve a considerable commutation of charge. They not only suspend certain descriptions of work now in progress, according to the plans of the late Government, according to the Estimates of last year, but they bring into view other descriptions of work of a very extensive character, and of very great importance; of such a description as to raise the whole question of supplying the naval stations abroad, and the whole question of the number of men to be voted for the navy. That being one of the material circumstances of the case, we have also this, that in the House of Commons to-night we neither have the Minister who prepared these Estimates (Sir John Pakington) to move them, nor the Minister under whose responsibility they are to be carried into effect (Mr. Corry). I trust that my noble Friend the present Secretary to the Admiralty (Lord Henry Lennox) will not suppose that I am impeaching his personal competence to propose the Navy Estimates. I have often heard him speak in this House, and I never heard him when he did not do great credit to himself and great justice to the subject he had charge of; but I speak of his position and responsibility with reference to this subject. It is within my knowledge that many Members on this side of the House wish to bring into full view, by the discussion on the Navy Estimates, which will necessarily be a long one, the various important subjects of which I have indicated the heads. In the form of the present Navy Estimates it is obviously impossible that this discussion can take place in the House unless in the presence of the responsible Minister. We are not situated as we were on the subject of the Army Estimates, where there was a special necessity for obtaining the Vote of Men with a view to the passing of the Mutiny Act. With regard to money, if there is any necessity for passing a Navy Vote on that head, a Vote can be passed on account to meet any emergency. Notice could be given of such a Vote to-night, and it could be voted to-morrow evening. With regard to the number of men, there will be an opportunity next week, in the interval between the introduction and the second reading of the Reform Bill, to introduce the Navy Estimates, and then the subject can be fully debated. I put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether it is for the convenience of the House that we should proceed with the statement of the noble Lord (Lord Henry Lennox) this evening. It is not necessary that we should object to the noble Lord making a statement, if the Government think the course of public business will be advanced by that. But it will be impossible for us to arrive at a Vote, as to the number of men, because the question turns upon and involves a number of matters which could not be dealt with except in the presence of the responsible Minister. Would it not, upon the whole, be for the convenience of the House that a day should be appointed, in the middle of next week, for the purpose of dealing with the Navy Estimates? I think I shall be justified in the suggestion I have thrown out by those who have given their minds to the subject and who have the intention of debating it.

MR. WHITE: I do not share in the interest which my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Locke) seems to attach to the production of further statistics on the subject of Reform—in fact, I would much rather that we should have less figures and more frankness. We have reason to complain, not so much of the want of information as of the want of straightforwardness. Much as I love statistics myself, I am afraid we have had a plethora of them upon this subject. I complain, in common with many of my brother Members around me, of the air of mystery—the un-English air of mystery—which has been indulged in by the Government in reference to this question. It was the remark of a distinguished statesman that a proper secrecy was the only mystery of able men, but that mystery was the only secrecy of weak and cunning ones. I do not say in which category the present Government may be placed; but if mystery be wisdom, they may be called pre-eminently wise. It was said some seventy years ago by the late Mr. Sheridan, that the English people had no faith in the “little Isaac” class of politicians—“roguish, but devilish keen.” I trust the Government will not persist in this policy of mystery, and render Mr. Sheridan’s remark applicable to them. In saying thus much, let me ask the hon. Gentlemen who sit on the Ministerial side of the House to accept the assurance that I believe the party to which I have the honour to belong would be benefited by a twelve months’ absence from office; and in that spirit I do not begrudge them the tenure of their pleasant places on the Benches opposite.

Mr. Gladstone

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I do not intend, Sir, to trouble the House with any remarks upon the observations of the successor to Sheridan. With regard to the inquiry of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), I must say I consider it unreasonable. He himself was a Member of a Government which for seven years regulated the destinies of this country, and during those seven years the Navy Estimates were always moved by the Secretary of the Admiralty (Lord Clarence Paget). We did not hear then that it was unsatisfactory to the House that the First Lord of the Admiralty should not be present, or that the Minister of the Admiralty, who is responsible for the preparation of the Estimates, should not be a Member of this House. If therefore, Sir, the Navy Estimates could be moved by the Secretary of the Admiralty for seven years I cannot understand the grounds of the objections taken upon this occasion, more especially as my noble Friend the present Secretary (Lord Henry Lennox) is so perfectly competent to the task. The right hon. Gentleman asks me whether the public business would be retarded or inconvenienced by the adoption of the course which he has suggested. In answer to that I have to say that considering that the First Lord of the Admiralty (if his presence be absolutely necessary to move the Estimates) cannot take his seat until the 25th of this month, I have no hesitation in saying that the course proposed would be most inconvenient to the course of public business, and would, moreover, seriously embarrass certain arrangements which have been made. The right hon. Gentleman talks much of the presence of the Minister of the Admiralty, who is responsible for the preparation of the Estimates. I have already shown to the House that it is not absolutely necessary that the First Lord of the Admiralty should move the Estimates; because for the last seven years this has not been done. But allow me, Sir, to remark that every Minister is responsible for the preparation of these Estimates. What was our proposal with respect to the business this evening? We proposed that the Estimates should be moved by the Secretary of the Admiralty; but when we made that arrangement it was thought that my noble Friend the Secretary would, according to all calculation and expectation, have had by his side my right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington), the late First Lord of the Admiralty, who would have been prepared also to have spoken upon any subject which the House might think required elucidation. An accident, the non-return of the writ, has prevented this proposal being carried out. I repeat, that when the objection was taken, notice of which, owing to the courtesy of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, was given us, the presence of my right hon. Friend the late First Lord of the Admiralty was certainly counted upon. Nobody, in fact, doubted that he would be present. I must say, therefore, that I do not see in the tone taken by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) upon this subject, exactly that temper which I should have counted upon, whatever might have been the struggles of party, with reference to the better conduct of the public business. Let me remind the right hon. Gentleman, that if no objection had been taken on the first night on which my right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon (General Peel) was prepared to move the Army Estimates, if he had been permitted to go on then, my right hon. Friend the then First Lord of the Admiralty (Sir John Pakington) would on the Thursday following have moved the Navy Estimates, and we should not have been in the somewhat embarrassing position in which the House is now placed. I am perfectly aware that if hon. Gentlemen, acting from what they consider to be their duty, choose to control the necessary business of this House, it is impossible for us to resist an appeal of that sort, because Motion after Motion can be made. I think it undesirable that the Estimates should be moved unless there is a general concurrence in the House upon the subject. My opinion is, that it will be convenient for the public service that we should proceed as the paper indicates, but I must leave it to the House to decide.

SIR GEORGE GREY: The right hon. Gentleman has misunderstood the objection of my right hon. Friend. He did not mean to imply that the Estimates should never be moved by the Secretary of the Admiralty. When the First Lord of the Admiralty does not sit in this House, the Secretary is the recognised organ of the Department. His objection was, that it is unusual and inexpedient for him to move the Estimates when he is not the recognised organ of the Admiralty. When the First Lord has a seat in this House, it is he who should give the necessary explanations of matters of importance which may arise in the course of the debate. The right hon. Gentleman opposite seems to admit the force of that objection, because he says that he had counted upon the presence of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War (Sir John Pakington.) If that right hon. Gentleman had taken his seat, there would have been no objection to proceeding with the Estimates, because he is the Minister who is directly responsible to the House for their preparation, and could no doubt have given every explanation that was required. No one, I am sure, will doubt the competency of the noble Lord opposite (Lord Henry Lennox) to deal with this subject. The House will be happy to hear his statement if the right hon. Gentleman thinks that his making it to-night will advance the public business; but he must not expect that a debate can be taken as if the First Lord of the Admiralty or the Secretary of State for War were in their places, or that any Vote, except on account, can be agreed to.

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Sir, it is so unusual a circumstance for me to find myself the subject of a debate in this House, that perhaps I may be allowed to say a few words with reference to what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with his usual kindness, has wished to press my statement upon the House to-night. I was willing to make that statement, and should, under any circumstances, have prefixed it with an apology to the House that a person occupying so humble a position as I do should move such important Estimates as these. If the Opposition, led by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire (Mr. Gladstone), had, out of regard for the state of public business, been willing to allow me to make my statement, and to follow it up by practical action in the shape of a Vote for the number of men, I was ready to undertake a task the magnitude of which no one who has not attempted to perform it can appreciate, especially when it is undertaken, as I may be allowed to say I have undertaken it, at three day's notice. Under the circumstances, however, I must respectfully decline to make a statement which is not to be followed by any practical action of the Committee. In conclusion, I have only to state that when my right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Corry) who will, I hope, be returned to the House in the course of next week—he having been eight years away from the Department over which he now presides, during which time matters have greatly changed—I may, perhaps, from the experience which I have gained in the last eight months, be able to be of some use to him. At all events, I shall be delighted to give to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire and his Friends any assistance that I can to elucidate the items of the Votes.

MR. GLADSTONE: I rise for the purpose of explanation. I made no objection to the statement of my noble Friend (Lord Henry Lennox) being made if it were considered necessary or convenient by the Government. But I must point out that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not answered the rather important questions I put to him.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I think the first question was whether the Reform Bill would be in the hands of Members on Tuesday? Certainly, I believe it will. I have no doubt of it. The second question was, as to the distinction between the £10 householders—those who were rated and those who paid by their landlords. My impression is that such a statement can be made out. I will communicate with my right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Gathorne Hardy), and will give the information if possible.

Lord Henry Lennox

MR. OSBORNE: I should be very sorry that it should go forth that this side of the House is unanimously of opinion that the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty should not be permitted to proceed with the Navy Estimates, and take a Vote to-night. It appears to me that the public out of doors will not be satisfied unless the Navy Estimates are brought forward. Due notice has been given. My noble Friend the Secretary of the Admiralty (Lord Henry Lennox) is the recognised organ of the Government on the subject, and the First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Corry) cannot possibly take his place in this House till Monday. [Sir GEORGE GREY: The discussion will all come over again.] But why not give the Government a Vote on Account of the Navy Estimates this evening? We know that subordinates in this House are generally so sat upon by their superior officers that they have seldom a chance given them of showing their talents. The ability for perspicuity of statement possessed by my noble Friend is recognised by all. I am sorry, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has on this occasion displayed such squeezable materials, and I think the House will do well to allow my noble Friend to make his statement, and, if necessary, to take a Vote on Account. We shall then be expediting the public business; at all events, we shall not be putting the country to any inconvenience. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will put the noble Lord up, and that we shall go into the Navy Estimates forthwith.

MR. HORSMAN: I think there is some misunderstanding as to the course intended to be taken by the Government, and as to what is the objection of my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone.) It is very reasonable that the noble Lord should be permitted to make his statement and take a Vote on Account. If that is the intention of the Government no objection ought to be raised. But I understood the objection of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lancashire to be that the statement ought not to be followed by taking the Vote for the Wages of the Men, which would involve the whole policy of the Estimates. That, of course, opens a large question, and I think it may fairly be considered by the Government whether in the absence of their recognised organ in this House it ought to be pressed forward to-night.

LORD HENRY LENNOX: If, Sir, I am allowed to make my statement, and carry forward the Estimates as far as I can in the same position and under the same conditions as if the First Lord of the Admiralty was, like the late First Lord, a Member of the House of Peers, I am quite willing to go into the discussion; but I must respectfully decline to make any statement on sufferance.

MR. STANSFELD: The noble Lord is labouring under some misapprehension. I can assure him that so far as my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone), and all of us on this Bench are concerned, we are most desirous that he should make his statement. Our difficulty is this. The House is aware that when the Vote for Wages has been passed it is not competent to any Member to discuss questions of general policy. Now, there are a number of us, some upon this Bench, and some sitting behind us, who are anxious to discuss general questions arising out of the policy of naval administration. We do not doubt the ability of the noble Lord to deal with those questions or to reply to us; but we should like to hear the views of the late First Lord of the Admiralty, as some of us may have something to say upon them. Therefore, it is not so much the absence of the present First Lord as that of the right hon. Gentleman who was First Lord when the Estimates were prepared, that leads us to hope that the Government will, at any rate, consent not to take a Vote for Wages to-night, and will give us the fair opportunity of discussing the policy of the Admiralty, of which they ought not to seek to deprive us.

SIR HENRY EDWARDS: Should the suggestion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer be adopted by the House, we may have to wait till the end of the Session before an opportunity offers to discuss these Estimates, in the event of the first Lord of the Admiralty not being returned by his late constituency. The course taken by the Opposition appeared to him to have but one interpretation, and should the noble Lord be prevented making his statement on that occasion the country would believe that the delay was caused by factious opposition. At the beginning of the Session the House was given to understand by the right hon. Member for South Lancashire that every possible effort would be made by those who sat on the other side of the House to assist the Government in carrying on the public business. But what had occurred since that assurance was given? Every measure brought forward by the Government had been, more or less, objected to. An objection was raised to the late Secretary for War (General Peel) bringing forward the Army Estimates, and now a similar objection was raised to the Navy Estimates being introduced by the noble Lord. After the conduct of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Gladstone) upon this occasion the country would come to the conclusion that nothing was to pass this Session which the right hon. Gentleman and those who thought with him could possibly prevent being carried. He was much pleased to hear some time since the unanimous cheer from below the gangway when it was announced that the Government was to have fair play. He repeated, that if the House was prevented from going into the Navy Estimates that night, it would go forth to the country that those who sat opposite were the real obstructives, while those on the Government side of the House were doing their utmost to forward public business.

MAJOR JERVIS said, that there was a great difference between the case of the late Secretary for War introducing the Army Estimates and the present Secretary to the Admiralty moving the Navy Estimates. The House was willing that the right hon. Gentleman should explain the Army Estimates, which had been prepared under his directions, but he took no Vote for Men on that occasion. Taking into consideration the present state of the country and of Europe, he thought it unadvisable that any Vote should be taken in the absence of the present and the late First Lords of the Admiralty which would preclude future discussion upon important questions relating to the administration of the navy. He therefore hoped, if the noble Lord made his statement that night, detailing the general scheme and plan of the Government in reference to the administration of the navy, that no Vote for Wages would be taken.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had last spoken had inadvertently fallen into an error when he stated that his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon had not been permitted to take a Vote for Men on the evening when he moved the Army Estimates. His right hon. and gallant Friend did take a Vote for the number of Men. He did not see why any questions in connection with the administration of the navy hon. Gentlemen wished to discuss could not be brought on that evening, notwithstanding the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Admiralty. As his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had already observed, for several years questions of the first importance in reference to the navy had been always discussed in the absence of the First Lord of the Admiralty, who with the Secretary for War had sat in the other House. It therefore appeared to him that whether the matter was looked at in the light of constitutional practice or of convenience to individual Members, there was nothing to prevent Her Majesty's Government from proceeding with the public business, and of taking a Vote in the ordinary course. He thought that the public convenience would be best consulted by the House permitting the noble Lord to make his statement.

MR. SANDFORD said, he wished to suggest that the noble Lord should adopt a medium course by making his statement, but not taking a Vote that would preclude subsequent discussion. Could not a Vote on Account be taken?

LORD HENRY LENNOX: I am sorry to be again obliged to trouble the House, or to appear unyielding, but in answer to the question of my hon. Friend I have to point out that the discussion of those questions would not be in the least degree less open if I moved these Estimates than it would be if they were introduced by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Corry). I must most emphatically say that I can only consent to move the Estimates to-night on the same conditions as if my Chief was in the other House of Parliament.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon had prepared the Army Estimates which he had introduced, and therefore he was perfectly competent to give any detailed explanations which the House might require. But the First Lord of the Admiralty was not present to answer questions which hon. Gentlemen might wish to put to him on the subject of the naval administration. He therefore trusted that the noble Lord would not take any step which would prevent future discussion upon the subject.

Lord John Manners

MR. HENRY BAILLIE said, he hoped that the Government would not bind themselves to follow the course of action dictated by hon. Gentlemen opposite. The course for Government to pursue was to bring forward their Estimates and to move a Vote for the number of Men. If hon. Gentlemen opposite thought proper to oppose the Vote for the number of Men they could do so.

Motion, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

LORD HENRY LENNOX: Mr. Dodson—I hardly know exactly the position in which I stand. I thought that the Order for going into Committee of Supply was discharged, and that, consequently, the House would proceed with the consideration of other business; but I now see that Mr. Speaker has left the Chair, and I am told that for the sake of the public convenience I am bound to make a statement and move the Navy Estimates for the year. In making that statement I must, in a special manner, claim the indulgence and the clemency of this Committee, who I do not doubt will take into consideration the very short time I have had since I received notice from Her Majesty's Government that, in consequence of the state of public business, it was desirable that I should undertake this most onerous task. Before I plunge, so to speak, into the various Votes which form the Estimates for the year, I will give the Committee a short epitome of the sums required for the Naval Service last year, comparing them with those which we ask the Committee to grant for the present year, and will allude to the salient points in which the present Estimates differ from those of last year. In the year 1866-7 my gallant Predecessor and Relative, Lord Clarence Paget, asked the Committee to vote the sum of £10,434,735, and at a later period of the Session Four Supplementary Votes were added, amounting, in round numbers, to £46,500. One of these was an additional charge for an improved system of retirement for officers of the Royal Navy.

Another was for the first three months' increased pay of the medical officers of the navy. The remaining sums were for the first instalment for building of a turret ship by Captain Cowper Coles, and the sum expended for completion of Her Majesty's ship Northumberland. Now, the sum which I shall ask the Committee to vote for 1867-8 is £10,926,253, being an excess of £545,000 over the original Estimate of last year, and of £491,518 over the whole sum voted in 1866-7, including the Supplementary Estimates for the Navy. The Committee must not for a moment imagine that the whole of that sum is required for the Effective Service of the Navy. The impression which has prevailed of late years, that the whole amount which is annually to be found in the Estimates is required for the service of the Navy, is an entirely erroneous one. For the Effective Service of the Navy there is this year required a sum of £9,067,758, that being an increase of £480,260 over the Effective Services of last year. For the Non-effective Services there is required a sum of nearly £2,000,000, and that includes many items over which the Board of Admiralty can exercise no control. There is, for instance, an item for the increase of half-pay and pensions, which, depending as it does upon casualties of life and health, are beyond our control. Then there is the Transport Department, the control of which rests with the War Office, for they alone decide what troops shall be sent out, and where and when they shall be sent, nothing being left to the Admiralty but to carry out those orders. From this cause, as may be imagined, the head of the Transport Department finds it very difficult to give any accurate Estimate at the commencement of the year of what sum will be required, the demand for transports being liable to change, from various causes, and to special and unforeseen demands arising from time to time. Another item of an exceptional nature is the sum of £50,000, being the first moiety of £100,000 towards the building of a two-turreted ship for the colony of Victoria. This, I need hardly say, was a question of colonial policy, and was granted because it was thought advisable to encourage that colony in spirit of self-reliance in its own defences for the future by assisting in providing it with such a vessel. Another £50,000 will accordingly appear among the Miscellaneous Estimates next year. I will now proceed to draw the attention of the Committee to the salient points of difference between the present and last year's Estimates. The principal increase in these Estimates is the excess of £528,000 over last year in Vote 10 section 2; but against this increase must be put a reduction of £175,000 in the Storekeeper General's Department. Before going into detail on these matters, I may remark generally that almost every Vote shows an increase, great or small, and I must ask the Committee to remember how difficult it is to prevent such an increase. When the national wealth is every day increasing, when every class of the community is raising itself in the social scale, and when costly inventions, both in shipbuilding and gunnery, are continually being made, it is almost impossible to keep the amount of expenditure within the limit of former Estimates. I can only assure the Committee that the most careful attention has been given to the subject by the Board of Admiralty, under the presidency of my right hon. Friend the present Secretary for War (Sir John Pakington), and no sensible increase in any Vote has been admitted without the closest examination and the most careful scrutiny. It will no doubt be interesting to the Committee to know the exact number of ships which the country had in commission at the time the Estimates were framed, and I have before me a list showing that that number was 154. The first Vote which I shall have to bring before the House, and which I am surprised to hear is likely to give rise to much controversy, states that the number of seamen, boys, and coastguardmen, required for the service of the year, is 51,683, and this shows a reduction of 285 officers and men over the number taken in 1866-7. The reduction among the commissioned officers is 134, and is the result of an arrangement made some sixteen months ago by the late Board of Admiralty with regard to the engineers. There is also a small diminution in the number of subordinate officers. The reduction in the number of commissioned officers is, as I have said, due to an arrangement arrived at sixteen months ago by the Board of Admiralty for stopping the entry of engineers, and was come to in consequence of the great number of those officers in that service. The reduction in the number of subordinate officers is owing to a Minute suggested by one of the most distinguished Members—indeed, I may say, the most distinguished Member—of the present Board, Sir Alexander Milne, for the purpose of restricting the entries of naval cadets in the course of the present year. On coming into office that gallant Admiral found that the average entries of naval cadets had been of late 172 a year, and allowing twenty-six of these to leave, or at the rate of 15 per cent per annum, there would remain 166 in service; whereas the average number of lieutenants promoted was sixty, and the number of sub-lieutenants now in the service is 284, that is a four years' supply. In six years, at this rate, the number would have gone on increasing from the want of means of promotion, and at the end of that period there would have been found 430 of these young gentlemen on the list. Under these circumstances, my gallant Friend induced the Board to restrict for a time the entries, and that accounts for a slight reduction in the number of the subordinate officers. There is also a decrease of 145 among the petty officers and seamen; but, as those who have studied the question are aware, the relative proportion in the number of petty officers and seamen depends very much on the class of ships that are in commission. The number of seamen we ask for is 37,015, while last year it was 37,300, and the cost will be £1,990,862, the cost last year being £1,979,048; but adding the Supplementary Vote of £3,655, taken during last Session, for the first three months' increased pay to medical officers, the 37,300 men will actually cost the country £1,982,693, or £8,169 less than the 37,015 men will cost this year. I shall, of course, be asked how it is that a reduced number of men will cost an increased amount of money, and to that I have only one answer to make. The increase is due in a great measure to the generosity of the House, for last year there was a Supplementary Vote sanctioned for advantage of the medical officers, and another for an improved scheme of retirement for officers of the Royal Navy. Moreover, there are accidental circumstances which account for this increase, for there are more officers on higher rates of pay than there were last year, and there is a small increase in number of warrant officers. As the Committee is aware, the number of seamen is very liable to decrease, and the Board have therefore decided to add 418 to the number of boys, that being, as I think will be universally admitted, a very legitimate way of meeting the wants of the navy. The number of boys will thus be 7,418, and they will be thus distributed—4,318 will be employed in the fleet, 68 will be placed in troop ships, and 3,100 in training ships; and owing to the large amount of accommodation in our training ships stationed in the various ports, no additional vessels of the kind will be required to be fitted up for their reception. With regard to the Vote for the Men, it was the practice of my gallant and most successful predecessor (Lord Clarence Paget), when stating the number required, to make a statement respecting the moral and physical welfare of the seamen and the general popularity of the service. I will follow his example. It is with great pleasure I am able to make a satisfactory announcement under both these heads. The waste of seamen at the present time is under 10 per cent, which is less than it has been for some time past, and the number of continuous service men has largely increased. I hold in my hand a Return of the number of continuous service men in the fleet and coastguard at the present time. On the 31st of March, 1866, the number was 31,336; while on the 1st of January, 1867, it was 31,612, being an increase of nearly 300. That is a large increase in the time and very satisfactory, as showing the increased popularity of the service. The numbers of desertions, of crimes, and of punishments is always regarded as a fair test of the state of the navy. From official Returns it appears the average number of men borne in 1864 was 48,507, and in 1865, 47,474; and of these in 1864, 298, and in 1865, 289 only were flogged, and in the former year the desertions amounted to 1,583, as compared with 1,328 in the year following. I will read a table giving the proportion of deserters in the last few years. In 1862 it was 4½ per cent; in 1863, 3½ per cent; in 1864, 3 per cent; in 1865, 2½ per cent; in 1866, 2½ per cent; and in 1867 only 2½ per cent. These may be minute details; but they show the Committee the satisfactory state in which the personnel of our navy now is. There is another point upon which Lord Clarence Paget always laid great stress, and which now presents an equally satisfactory aspect, and that is the increase in the good-conduct pay of the navy. I will not trouble the Committee with the figures; but the increase of the good-conduct pay this year has been very considerable. Another point is also satisfactory—the continued increase shown in the number of trained gunners. In 1861 the number was 2,268; in 1866 it was 5,786—showing an increase of 3,518 trained gunners. But it is not only the moral welfare of the navy to which it is my duty to call the attention of the Committee; its sanitary state has always occupied the attention of Parliament, and the health of the navy, according to Reports of year 1865-6, is most satisfactory. The rate of sickness per 1,000 was 31·4, being the lowest rate that has occurred within the last ten years, while the average ratio of those last ten years has been 35·1 per 1,000 men. The death-rate has also been the lowest for many years past—namely, 10·5 per 1,000; whereas the average for the previous ten years has been 15·5 per 1,000. Excluding deaths from injuries, it was last year only 8 per 1,000, which is 1·1 lower than the average rate of mortality among the healthiest class of our operatives. I must now touch upon a subject of a painful character; but it is one of paramount importance, inasmuch as it concerns not only the efficiency of our army and navy, but also affects the strength and vigour of the human race. We have provided a wing in the hospital at Plymouth for the reception of a certain class of patients, under authority of the Contagious Diseases Act, and have also provided accommodation for patients at certain garrison towns. Three of these are under the care of the Admiralty, and the others are under the control of the War Office. My right hon. Friend (General Peel), in moving the Estimates for the War Department the other night, told the Committee the steps which he had taken, and was about to take, in this direction. My hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaid), whose exertions in this cause are well known, and who is at the head of one of the best institutions of this kind in the metropolis, will confirm what I have to say respecting the favourable effects which have resulted from the legislation to which I allude. The Contagious Diseases Bill was originally introduced under the sanction of Lord Clarence Paget. Its operations were strengthened and its provisions extended last year, and now, under the Vote this year for the Prevention of Contagious Diseases, we ask for a sum of £1,500 in excess of that of last year. It is at Portsmouth that the least success has, up to this time, attended our efforts; but from this very circumstance we may draw a by no means unfavourable augury for the future. As yet there has been a great want of accommodation in that port, and owing to this and other causes little has been done, but better accommodation has now been provided; and in answer to inquiries as to whether at Haslar there had been any perceptible difference in the number of patients and the severity of the disease, I was informed that there had been already an amelioration in the character, and a diminution in the number of cases. From Sheerness, the report of the medical officer is that the disease is almost destroyed. In Plymouth, a wing set apart for these cases has been added to the Albert Hospital, towards which the Admiralty have subscribed a sum of money. There is already accommodation in this hospital for sixty of these unfortunate women, and there will be room for sixty more next June. Admiral Martin, the Commander-in-Chief on that station, writes from Plymouth, that the operation of the Contagious Diseases Prevention Act has been most encouraging. The disease is sensibly diminishing, and is greatly modified in its character. These cases used to amount to 7½ per cent of the patients at the Royal Naval Hospital; but by the last Returns there are now not more than 2½ per cent. Last year the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), when this Vote was before the Committee, drew a comparison between the system in force in France and that in this country, stating that in the former country the authorities endeavoured not only to cure the body of these outcasts, but also to try and save their soul. The hon. Member expressed his conviction that the House of Commons ought not to sanction any Vote of this kind unless some provision for the moral and spiritual improvement of these unfortunate women was made. It is my pleasing duty to state that the Admiralty have taken the hon. Gentleman's suggestion into consideration, and have sanctioned a gift of £100 to the Samaritan Fund at Portsmouth and also at Plymouth, and £50 at Sheerness. The chaplains will also attend at the hospitals three days a week. When progressing to convalescence the poor outcasts are taught household work, such as washing and ironing, at the hospital at Plymouth, and the pleasing fact remains as a testimony to the worth of the promoters, that a large portion of them have been reclaimed and restored to their parents or to society. I believe that there is no sum of money in these Estimates that will be so well bestowed as the £1,500 excess in this Vote. In Vote 2 there is a slight increase, but it depends upon the augmented price of provisions in the market, and is not therefore an excess over which the Admiralty have any control. The next Vote is for the Admiralty Office, and shows an increase of £2,363, and before I go further, I will express my astonishment that the Admiralty have not been compelled to ask for a much larger increase under this head. The accumulation of work at the Admiralty has, indeed, been so great and so rapid that nothing but the energy of the clerks, directed by the unwearied assiduity of the heads of departments, enables them to get through the work they have to do. In order to give the Committee some idea of the increase in the Admiralty correspondence, I will mention that in 1831 the number of letters dispatched was 30,000; in 1866, it was 75,000. In the Controller's Department alone, from 1860 to 1866, the number of letters has increased from 32,823 to 69,139. This will give the Committee some idea of the immense increase of correspondence, in comparison with which there has only been a small increase of salaries and of clerks. Vote 5 for scientific purposes includes an increased sum for the school of Naval Architecture; and I have to state that this school is in a flourishing condition. It was actually started by Lord Clarence Paget. But the scheme was, I believe, originally sketched out by the Institute of Naval Architects, and Lord Clarence Paget, with his usual good sense, took up the idea, and set the scheme in motion. The School of Naval Architecture is now going on most favourably, and the small increase in the Vote, for which I have to ask, is in order to enable us to increase the number of students from twenty-four to the full number of thirty. I am anxious not to detain the Committee for a moment longer than is necessary; but I now come to a Vote upon which I wish, as far as I am able, to convey the exact sentiments of my right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington), who but for an unforeseen occurrence would have been in his place to-night. I refer to Vote 6, for the Wages of the Artisans employed in the Dockyards and Naval yards at home and abroad. After the recent debates in this House on dockyard expenditure, the very mention of this Vote seems to threaten a long discussion. But this question was so thoroughly ventilated when it was recently brought forward by the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely), that I hope it will be agreed that on that part of it which refers to whether the public money is properly expended, whether the artificers work sufficiently long, and whether the articles are produced cheap enough, I think it is not necessary for me to weary the House by entering into details on the present occasion. On this Vote, No. 6, there is a decrease. I am happy to think that at last I come to a decrease—however small—of £1,603. But while there is a general decrease on the Vote, there is a small increase in the amount required for rates, taxes, and police expenses. We have this year a decrease of 297 men in the number employed in the home dockyards and factories. The number in 1866-7 was 18,618, the expense being £1,065,194. In 1867-8 the number will be 18,321, and the cost £1,064,635. Unfortunately, that decrease in the number of men, following, as I venture to think, a law of nature in regard to these things, costs almost as much as the larger number of last year—the saving effected by it only amounting to £559. The next point connected with this Vote which calls for remark is the fact that although the number of men employed in home dockyards and factories is reduced, the number of those borne upon the establishments is slightly increased. Previous to 1850, it was the practice greatly to exceed the number allowed on the establishment; and, in 1864, the Board of Admiralty fixed the number of established artificers throughout the dockyards at 9,610, of which 8,714 were artificers; and at that time there were also first-class labourers who were entitled to pension. These men receive 2s. 2d. a day, and as they die out they are not filled up; but their places on the establishment are taken by artificers who are paid 4s. 6d. per day as wages. This is one cause of increase of cost; but it is only carrying out the policy laid down by the late Board of Admiralty in 1864, when they stated what in their opinion was the lowest point to which the established artificers ought to be reduced. The artificers who are thus placed on the establishment are taken from the apprentices in our dockyards or from the best of the workmen who have served there in the capacity of hired men. When any future Board of Admiralty takes into consideration the question whether or not it is advisable to keep the number of established artificers where it is now, one point that will have to be taken into account is, that this prospect of being absorbed into the establishment has been held out to these men as a boon which they are to look forward to the prospect of which has induced them to accept the wages given in the dockyard instead of higher wages offered by private firms. And here I may mention that during our official tour of the various dockyards last autumn, the Board of Admiralty was besieged—or, at least, had interviews—with deputations from every one of the trades employed in those yards. This, I believe, was the case with hon. Gentlemen opposite when they were in office. All of those deputations urged upon us that as house rent and the cost of food, clothing, and all other necessities had largely increased, their rates of remuneration ought to be raised. Nothing, I think, could be more distressing than to be unable to accede to their requests, for the appearance, the language, and the respectful manner of these men did much to enlist for their claims the favourable sympathy and attention of the Board of Admiralty. Since then, however, great depression has occurred in all branches of the shipbuilding trade, and the consequence of that is that the principles of political economy forbade our increasing the wages of these men when we could get plenty of competent workmen for the same, or even a less amount. But there is one class of men whose pay we have thought it right to raise. I mean the day labourers, and their position was a truly lamentable one. Their pay was so small that any man with a wife and family to support could scarcely subsist upon it; and the Board of Admiralty have, therefore, decided to raise their pay 1*d.* and 2*d.* a day, and also to allow the hired labourers the same advantage, thus placing them on an equality as to pay with the established labourers, a boon of which, by some strange oversight, they have up to this been debarred. I trust that no one in this Committee will grudge this increase, which amounts to about £7,700. The smallness of this concession, and the comparative largeness of the expense which it involves, may give the Committee some faint idea how very costly any change must be which raises the salaries of our dockyard employés. There is another class to whose case our attention was called, and whose claim was found to be perfectly unanswerable; and I believe that the sum of money required for extending to them the boon to which we think them entitled is so inconsiderable, that the Committee will not refuse to grant it. I refer to the masters of bond fide in sea-going hoys, which are engaged in conveying valuable stores between the different dockyards and victualling yards. These persons are responsible for the safety of most valuable stores when conveying them from port to port. Hitherto, there has been no classification among these officers, and men who have held this position for only a year or two receive just the same pay as those who have served in this capacity for a very long period. We propose to divide them into three classes, of which the pay shall be in the following scale:—Those who have served twelve years shall be increased to 7*s.* a day, and that of those who have served over six and under twelve years, 6*s.*; and those whose service is under six years will receive 5*s.* per diem—a boon which will be much appreciated by the recipients, and which, considering the responsibility resting on them, is not more than they ought to have. The next point to which I wish respectfully to draw the attention of the Committee is the very large sum which the country now pays for the service of these yard craft. In 1866-7 the amount of this charge was £116,422, and for 1867-8 it is estimated at £107,958, the cost for those two years combined being £224,380. This head of expenditure has been going on in the same ratio for years and years past, notwithstanding that in some instances railways have been brought down almost to the very doors of the victualling yards, affording, as it would seem, greater facilities for the transport of stores of a perishable nature in sending them by rail instead of by sea from port to port. With a view to clear up this matter I caused a Return to be prepared as to this branch of expenditure. It was, like all other Returns sent to the Admiralty, admirably compiled, and was given with the greatest precision; but it was so voluminous and minute in its details that it entirely confused me, and rendered me utterly unable to come to any more decided conclusion than that there was ample room for further inquiry. I therefore brought the question before the Board of Admiralty, and my right hon. Friend, now the Secretary of State for War (Sir John Pakington), seeing the difficulty of sifting these things at a distance and getting at the truth about them in Whitehall, has decided to nominate a committee, composed of two gallant officers, Sir Sidney Dacres and Admiral Symonds, with two civilians, who will visit the dockyards and judge for themselves by careful inspection whether arrangements might not be made for effecting a diminution of expense, with, at the same time, increased advantage to the public service. Another matter is the unsatisfactory way in which the work in the shipbuilding yard is carried out under the system of day pay. Complaints have been made that we do not get a fair day's work for a fair day's wages. My right hon. Friend the present Minister for War and myself were much struck with some matters that were brought under our notice, and during our official tour, and also subsequently, we have had conversations with the various superintendents of the yards to see whether any other system that would be more economical and better for the interests of the country might not be adopted. Of course, the quicker a ship is built the more economical it is. At Chatham and at Pembroke we found that there prevailed, in respect to the building of iron ships, a practice of day pay with piecework up to a certain point, allowing the men to earn 25 per cent more than their daily pay. This system has been, in different degrees, tried on the two vessels last built—namely, Bellerophon and Hercules. Both of them are iron-clads; and they were ordered by the Duke of Somerset. I hold in my hand a statement prepared by Captain Houston Stuart, the most intelligent and energetic superintendent of Chatham yard, showing the work that was performed on the Bellerophon and the Hercules, and illustrating the advantages of piecework as compared with daywork. By this Return it appears that the number of tons of material worked into the Bellerophon during the first 52 weeks of her progress was 1,716, while during the same number of weeks the amount worked into the Hercules by piecework was 2,767; the cost of labour in the case of the Bellerophon being £24,196, in that of the Hercules £30,899, the amount, of course, being larger in the latter case, because the men were allowed to earn more than their daily pay. The cost per ton for labour, however, which for the Bellerophon was £14 2s., was for the Hercules only

Lord Henry Lennox

Lord Henry Lennox

Lord Henry Lennox

£11 3s. 6d. It further appeared that the average number of tons of material per week prepared and worked into the ships, extending over 52 weeks, was in the case of the Bellerophon 33, in that of the Hercules 53 tons. The average number of tons per week worked into them from their commencement in the dock being in the case of the former 49, in that of the latter, by the extended system of piecework, 86; while the total number of days expended for all trades was on the Bellerophon 119,520, on the Hercules 137,250; the average number of days per ton being 69½ for the Bellerophon, 49½ for the Hercules. My right hon. Friend the Secretary for War was very much struck by this statement, as I think the Committee will be, and there is every hope that the system will be introduced into our wooden shipbuilding, although whether it will ever be carried out with respect to that most unsatisfactory part of dockyard work, the repairs and re-fitting of vessels, I am much less sanguine. I now come to another point to which I wish to invite particular attention. When the present Board of Admiralty came into office they were very much surprised, on looking over the Returns of the expenditure in our dockyards, to see the large amount of wages of artificers and shipwrights which was annually set aside for the repairs of old as compared with the building of new ships. They consequently examined into the subject very closely, and the result is that we are enabled in these Estimates to effect an entire change in these relative proportions. All through the autumn submissions were sent in to us asking our assent to these costly repairs, in some of which the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely) would have delighted to revel. At length the Board of Admiralty decided that a line must be drawn, and that vessels which were no longer fit to fight or to run away should not be repaired at anything but a very small cost, and for temporary service. I have therefore the gratification of being in a position to state that, whereas last year £240,000 were taken for the wages of artificers for building ships, and £290,000 for repairs—that is to say, £50,000 more for repairing than building—we ask this year £344,000 for building and £284,000 for repairs—in other words, an excess of £60,000 for building over repairs, instead of £50,000 excess for repairs over building. I only hope that this commencement in a direction which I think is right will find favour with the Committee; and that if, owing to any accident to which Governments are always liable, the present Board of Admiralty should not long retain office, our policy in this respect will not be reversed by our successors. Next comes the question, as to what class of ships we should build. In dealing with this point, I must be permitted to allude to an answer which was given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary for War (Sir John Pakington) at the close of last Session, which has been somewhat misunderstood. He, on the occasion to which I refer, stated that such was the condition of our reserve of small ships that there was the greatest difficulty in supplying the necessary number of reliefs to our squadrons on foreign stations. That statement at the time it was made was much commented upon in some of the newspapers, as conveying an animadversion on the administration of the late Board of Admiralty; but nothing could have been further from his intention. What my right hon. Friend said was merely a repetition of that which was embodied in a document signed by a distinguished officer who occupied the position of the First Naval Lord in the late Administration. Now, in proof of the correctness of this statement, I may mention that, if any accident were to occur to any of our vessels on foreign stations, we have at the present time only seven vessels ready to be sent out to supply their places. Two of these, the Mersey and the Phæbe, are large frigates and not suitable for that service, two of the others are sloops, Chanticleer, and Cameleon, and other three are gunboats, and these are all the vessels that the Admiralty have in the shape of a reserve if any disaster were to occur. There is, as hon. Gentlemen know, a constant demand for reliefs. I may here add that if there be any station in the world in which it is desirable that ships should not be allowed to remain for a long time without relief it is the African coast, because of the necessity which there is for change in order to preserve the health of the men. From that station the Commodore writes entreating us to send out two more vessels, inasmuch as he cannot otherwise dispense with the services of ships which, for sanitary reasons, it would be well to remove to St. Helena or Ascension. From the Pacific Squadron comes the same cry, and nothing can be done to comply with these requests until ships of a suitable size are provided, some of which I trust will soon be in readiness. While upon this subject I may, perhaps, though only a subordinate Member of the Government, be allowed to say that it is in my opinion a grave question whether the time has not come for the House of Commons and the country to consider what is the absolute necessity or advisability of keeping up large squadrons in all parts of the world of small unarmoured ships, which, when a more formidable ship than they approaches them must, what is vulgarly termed, "cut and run." At the present day, especially when, very properly, the principle of non-intervention is in the ascendant, no captain of one of these vessels would take upon himself, in the event of any dispute arising between British subjects and the Government of a country in whose waters his ship happened to be lying, to demand or exact immediate reparation. He could, in fact, do nothing until he received instructions how to act from Her Majesty's Government at home. Under these circumstances, I, for one, should feel the greatest satisfaction if the moment should arrive when Her Majesty's present Advisers or any other Government should deem it to be consistent with the interests of humanity and of the public service to modify or remove altogether the African coast squadron. By that means numbers of our seamen and officers would be saved from being devoured by the frightful pestilence which is so destructive on those shores. There are many distinguished officers, who, having studied this subject carefully, and knowing well the position of the slave trade, aver that by keeping up a small force composed, say, of two or three large and swift ships at Gibraltar, ready to pounce down at any moment unexpectedly on the agents of the slave traffic, that odious trade which has greatly diminished might be kept in check. These are questions of national policy which the Admiralty have no power to decide. All that we have to do is, so long as it is the policy of the country to maintain the present large squadrons, to provide a sufficient number of vessels efficiently to relieve them when occasion requires. That being so, our attention has been directed to what class of ships it is most desirable we should construct in our dockyards; and I am happy to say that we deem it, on the whole, the wisest thing to carry out in some measure the policy of the late Board of Admiralty, and to lay down a certain number of vessels of the Amazon class. The Amazon was a most unfortunate vessel; but, though she came to an untimely end partly through the neglect of a young officer, the Admiralty think that that is no reason why this useful class of vessels should be discontinued. They are most useful vessels, have great speed, and have superseded the Roebuck class of despatch boats, which never exceeded 11 knots per hour. The Amazon class have realized $12\frac{1}{2}$ and $12\frac{1}{2}$ knots, and they will carry instead of two 68-pounders some light guns, two $6\frac{1}{2}$ -ton rifle guns, and two 64-pounder rifle guns. Four of these are being laid down by us in the various dockyards, and being somewhat altered from the Amazon, are known as the Blanche class. The next vessel which we have ordered to be taken in hand is destined to replace a class of vessels which are very dear to the heart of our admirals, the old paddle-wheel steamers; of this class two are in course of building. They are of 1,460 tons, have admirable accommodation for a small number of troops and supernumeraries and for stores. If this class of vessel succeeds, there is no intention of building any more paddle-wheel steamers, as these being screws will be more economical. They will be known as Juno class. Many of the paddle steamers have been running for forty years, and have cost rather more than double their original value in repairs. It has also been thought expedient to lay down some gun vessels, known as the Plover class. Their burden is 678 tons, they carry three guns—one $6\frac{1}{2}$ ton rifle gun, and two 40-pounder rifle guns—are built of wood, and have twin screws, which enable them to turn with great facility. They have also a very slight draught of water, and are consequently fitted for going up creeks and rivers which larger vessels could not enter. They are expected to run as near as possible 11 knots per hour, or at least two knots in excess of the class they are intended to supersede. The Board of Admiralty propose to build ten of these vessels in our dockyards. The next is a useful class of vessels suited well for a peculiar service—namely, the suppression of piracy in China. Our present squadron in the China seas consists of thirty-six vessels, and of these twenty are gunboats built at the time of the Crimean war. They were hurriedly built of green wood, and are now

Lord Henry Lennox

rotting away, and it is therefore necessary to push forward as speedily as possible a class of vessels to take their place. Let me not be misunderstood; these vessels will be suitable for other service. My right hon. Friend the Secretary for War (Sir John Pakington) would never consent to build any class of ships which could be available for one particular service alone, as being vicious and uneconomical policy; and my right hon. Friend would not have sanctioned this outlay for relieving the squadron on the China station, unless the ships to be constructed were serviceable for the wants of the navy in other quarters. With this view we proposed to build ten gunboats of 460 tons; they are of a composite class, with iron frames and wooden planking. They will be of a light draught, and will require 120-horse power. There were in some of the Crimean gunboats, which have been broken up at Portsmouth, engines of 60-horse power, which, by taking two of them, will be of the required power, and rendered available for these vessels. All that it will be necessary to provide will be the boilers. A gentleman wrote the other day to The Times, pointing out what he designated as the extravagance of the Board of Admiralty, and stating that the Admiralty did not seem to know that various pairs of engines were rotting away at Portsmouth. So far from the Admiralty not knowing that these engines were at Haslar, they have for months past destined a use for them, and if the writer of that letter lives another year he will see some of those engines fitted, at a great saving of expense to the country, in some of these twin-screw composite gunboats. Besides these, there are in the course of completion this year, at Haslar, two other gunboats, the Orwell and Bruiser, which were ordered by the late Board. During the official inspection we observed at Pembroke and Chatham two small class wooden vessels far advanced, specimens of a class which had been tried and found wanting in the anticipated speed. They had, therefore, been left on the stocks, where they had remained for six years. One of these vessels was at Chatham—a gunboat of 425 tons and 80-horse power—the Newport, and there being a great want of surveying vessels, and this vessel being admirably adapted for the purpose, the Admiralty ordered its completion, and it is now being brought forward, and will be finished within the year.

The amount of money which has already been spent on the Newport is £5,618, and the total estimate to finish it is £13,630. The other vessel, the Myrmidon, at Pembroke, is larger, being 695 tons in burden, and of 200-horse power. The money spent on her up to the present time has been £14,682, and the estimate to finish her is £27,682. There is a larger work on which my right hon. Friend has entered, and which, I dare say, will raise some discussion. At three of Her Majesty's Dockyards persons are confronted on entering with what may be termed the skeletons of magnificent men-of-war. These three, Robust, Bulwark, and Repulse, were laid down as line-of-battle ships; but when the change came over the spirit of modern warfare, the shipwrights were taken off their work, and the vessels remained incomplete on the stocks. One of them, the Repulse, has up to the present time cost £61,711, and if she were broken up she would represent a loss to the country of £27,500. The Board of Admiralty has, however, decided to finish her as an armour-plated ship. She will be an improved Zealous class, and when completed she will take her place among our men-of-war with every chance of success—in fact, Admiral Yelverton, in his Report of the Channel Squadron, declares his conviction that these wooden conversions form a most useful class, and expresses his hope that the Government will provide the service with more such vessels. I do not know whether I have trespassed on the attention of the House too long; but as the Admiralty has now been persistently attacked on all sides, I wish, if a good case for it can be made out, that it should be done by me; and, as a proof that these much abused dockyards are capable of carrying out great works, let me read to the Committee the following programme:—The estimated cost of ships to be built (including completion for sea) in the Royal Dockyards during the financial year 1867-8, is as follows:—Iron-clad ships, tonnage 3,136, cost £216,346; iron-clad turret ship, Monarch, tonnage, 2,072, £124,320; iron frigate, Inconstant, tonnage, 1,801, £72,040; converted iron-clad frigate, Repulse, tonnage, 1,393, £83,580; wood corvettes, Juno and Thalia, tonnage, 1,139, £39,865; sloops, Blanche, &c., tonnage, 4,001, £142,936; gun vessel, Myrmidon, tonnage, 130, £4,290; twin-screw gun vessels, Plover, &c., tonnage 4,248, £140,184; twin-screw gunboat, Cracker, tonnage, 4,345, £139,040; surveying vessel, Newport, tonnage, 212, £6,996; gunboats, Bruiser and Cromer, tonnage, 201, £6,030; tug steamer, Carron, tonnage, 167, £1,775; yard craft, Woolwich, tonnage, 100, £1,715. Total tonnage, 22,945; total cost, £979,117. I must say I think that if the result bears out that Estimate, which I know has been most carefully prepared, the most ardent critic of the Admiralty will not be able to say that the dockyards have not turned out some good work for the Queen's service and for the Nation's money. In Vote No. 7, for the Victualling Yard, there appears an increase of £771, owing to some new machinery, which I will explain when we come to the Vote. I next come to Vote 10, section 1, which is most important, and with reference to which I must notice the great energy and absence of prejudice displayed by my hon. and gallant Colleague (Sir John Hay), under whose supervision the stores of the navy are placed. There appears a small increase of £17,000, of which £8,000 is for capstans for the new ships, and £8,000 for oil, an increase occasioned by the increased size of the engines in our large ships. There appears a reduction of £100,000 for coals, owing to the Indian Government taking on themselves the expense of what fuel is required for the Indian transports, of which there are five, although the ultimate saving on the year will not exceed one-fourth of that sum. [Mr. STANSFELD: There is a decrease in coal besides that.] You are quite right, but I had better not go into these minute details. The great reduction in the Storekeeper General's Vote is in the stock of timber. The establishment supply of timber is 60,000 loads, but that was fixed not in these days, when wooden shipbuilding is confined to small vessels, but in the high and palmy days of "the wooden walls." We therefore felt that now, when iron ships have almost entirely superseded wooden ones, an establishment supply of 60,000 loads was more than sufficient. The consequent reduction in the Storekeeper's Vote is £149,990. I now come to Vote 10, section 2, and this shows an increase of £572,000 for iron shipbuilding by contract. On this, the Controller of the Navy's Vote, I should like to be allowed to say a word or two. But for this excess of £572,000, the Estimates would have presented almost perfect identity of amount with those of last year. Therefore, I would wish particularly to draw the attention of the Committee to it. Of this increase it will be found that £83,850 is for the progress of the cupola ship, Captain, now building by Messrs. Laird, Brothers, of Birkenhead, and designed by my gallant friend Captain Coles, who has been allowed to chose his own tonnage, his own specification, and his own builder, in order to give the country a fair trial of his system, on the results of which we may be able with safety to rely. I must say here, in my place in Parliament, that there never was any body of men called to discuss questions of this kind who have brought to their discussion a more favourable feeling as regards the turret system, than did the Board of Admiralty over which my right hon. Friend the late First Lord (Sir John Pakington) presided. Of course, the Secretary to the Admiralty has no power of himself in such matters; but I may assert that from the First Lord down to the Secretary, they were one and all, from the first day of their deliberations, willing and anxious to give, I will not say a partial, but certainly a most favourable consideration to the plans of my gallant friend, and in every way in their power to assist. Unfortunately, various circumstances occurred with reference to the specifications which caused some delay in the laying down of the Captain; but that was owing to no want of attention on the part of the Admiralty, who did their utmost, by agreeing to every wish expressed by Captain Coles, to facilitate the progress of this great undertaking. The next item is a sum of £344,000 for the building of iron-plated ships. This Vote will be spread over two or three years, as occasion may require. But it may be asked where is the necessity of building more iron-plated ships? I have always listened with great pain when numerical comparisons have been drawn between our own force and that of neighbouring Powers with whom we are on terms of friendly alliance. Such comparisons are always liable to arouse a feeling of mistrust and apprehension, while they give to this country a most fallacious idea of its own power. In corroboration of this view I will refer to the fact that two eminent statesmen, now unhappily no longer with us—Lord Lyndhurst and Mr. Cobden—the one in the House of the Lords and the other in that Assembly which will never cease to deplore his loss—spoke, within a very few weeks, the one in favour of an alarmist policy, the other in support of the maintenance of peace and good-fellowship; on every point did they differ, save this, that they both maintained the great inadvisability of making invidious comparisons of force, as tending to produce irritation on the one hand and misconception in the public mind on the other. But it is interesting to know what force such a nation as the French, who can in no way be considered wholly or even mainly a Naval Power, think it right and safe to keep up without in any way menacing the peace of Europe. The French Government have a fleet of forty-three iron-clad ships. Of these they have sixteen first-class; but five of these went to sea, encountered a storm, and, according to the account given in a Foreign journal, came back like crippled ducks into the harbour whence they had issued. Four have been taken from the list of sea-going cruizers, and been adapted for harbour defence. There are four building. Of the second-class they have one built and seven building. Of the third-class they have twelve built, some very indifferent specimens, and three building. But the most remarkable feature is this—they have recently followed the example of the American Government, and have laid down in their dockyards four large wooden corvettes, which are intended to have very great speed, and to carry a very heavy armament. They are intended to be used for the defence of French commerce, or to attack the commerce of any country with which they may happen to be at war. The total number of vessels in the Navy of France is 365; in that of Spain, 95; in that of Austria, 70; in that of Italy, 82; in that of Russia 218; in that of America, 234. And let me here say one word with reference to the American Navy. I can only regret that I neglected to bring among my papers a copy of the very interesting Report made by the Minister of Marine to the American Congress, in which he gives the results of the year with regard to the navy of that country. It appears from that document, which entered into a much more minute and elaborate statement than that I have the honour of endeavouring to make, that the administrators of the American Navy have for the present no intention of following our example, and building large iron-clads after the pattern of those of this country. They intend to rely solely upon turreted Monitors, and upon those large wooden frigates which Lord Clarence Paget last year, I venture to think, rather inaptly termed "improved Alabamas," which are to be used in any future war in which America may be engaged in protecting their own commerce, and in injuring that of their foes. [Mr. CHILDERS said, those vessels were about 3,000 tons burden.] They are of a rather larger tonnage than that. I understand about 3,700 or 3,800 tons. Now, from what appears in the newspapers, there seems to be a prevailing idea that our own coasts are poorly defended, and that it would be advisable at once to build some turret vessels after the American model for the defence of our coasts; but I think that that is the last class of ship of which we are in immediate want. In the first place, I believe that nothing is more improbable—impossible I had almost said—than that our shores should be invaded. Secondly, I cannot forget that Mr. Wells in his report to Congress deplored the fact that in Portsmouth alone there was three times the accommodation that the whole dockyards of the United States could furnish, and that the private dockyards of England were in the same ratio vastly superior to those of America. Still, notwithstanding this want of dockyards national and private—in the course of five months, during the late war, that country converted its wooden ships into a fleet of turreted Monitors, sufficient to make a network, which would effectually serve to protect the long line of American coast from the most powerful enemy. If then America, with its limited means, could in so short a time produce such great results, what might not be effected by the spirit of Englishmen backed by the facilities derived from vast private yards, were so unhappy a contingency to arise? Under these circumstances I believe that this is a class of ships, the building of which may well be postponed. I may, perhaps, be asked, "Why do you add to your iron-clad fleet at all?" In reply I would ask, are the people and the Parliament of this country content that England shall stand still with regard to her navy, and allow all the other naval Powers of the world—be they great or small—attempt to pass her in the construction and in the scientific armament of their fleets? Upon this point I must, with no invidious motive, draw the attention of the Committee to the following figures:—In 1860-1 the sum of £582,805 was taken for iron-clad ships; in 1861-2, £935,932; in 1862-3, £966,141; in 1863-4, £630,203; and in 1864-5, £668,412. In 1865-6, £120,000 was asked for by my gallant Predecessor for building iron-clads; but that sum was not spent, and last year not a single farthing was asked for that purpose. Under these circumstances, unless the people of England desire that their fleet shall stand still, I think that the Board of Admiralty is justified in applying this year to Parliament for money for building iron-clads. The French naval authorities, whose example in this respect is followed by those of Austria and of Italy, make no unusual efforts at any particular time, but go on adding every year to their fleet, and year after year adopting the improvements suggested by science, and in the end those countries have obtained serviceable fleets. I am sure that that is the soundest policy that could have been pursued, and I only wish that it had been adopted in England. In this way she would not allow other countries to get gradually ahead of her. If we are to adopt the latest improvements, it is time, after two years in which nothing has been spent, that something should be done. I should be the last to act the part of an alarmist, to believe in the likelihood of any foreign invasion of our shores or in the probability of any direct attack being made upon the majesty of England.

Lord Henry Lennox

Mr. CHILDERS said, that the noble Lord appeared to forget that iron-clads were being built last year in the Royal Dockyards.

LORD HENRY LENNOX: I have already dealt with the dockyards. I am referring to the Vote for building iron-clads in private yards. Having come to the conclusion—rightly or wrongly—that the time had come when we must build additional iron-clads if we wished the country to keep its position among the naval Powers of the world, the question arose as to the class of which the new vessels should be. We had only eighteen iron-clads of the first class, but of these four—the Warrior, the Black Prince, the Defence, and the Resistance—were not perfect specimens. Of the second-class there were two iron-clads afloat and one building. This was a class of ship that was much wanted, but then came the difficulty, what was to be the pattern, whether the new ships should be built on the broadside or the turret principle. We knew that there was a strong bias in the public mind in favour of the latter; but it was the desire of the Admiralty to get a comparatively small class of sea-going vessels. My gallant Friend (Sir John Hay), one of the first authorities on this subject either in the House or out of it, has gone fully into this question; and though by some it was maintained that the turret principle might be applied with success to small sea-going ships, yet one thing was clear with regard to this question, that as the Captain selected and designed by Captain Coles to test the soundness of his views was in course of building, it was not desirable to spend more money in building additional turret ships until the completion of that large vessel. The Controller of the Navy—and every one who has occasion to transact business with Admiral Robinson will be able to testify to the clearness of his head, the calmness of his judgment, and the consideration with which he listens to suggestions from every quarter—has, in conjunction with Mr. Reed, undertaken to design an iron-clad ship, of the following proportions:—The new frigate will be of 3,778 tons burden, and of 800-horse power. Her draught will be 21 feet 6 inches forwards, and 22 feet 6 inches aft, while her speed is anticipated to be about $13\frac{1}{2}$ knots per hour. Her complement will be 450 men, and her sides will be protected by armour-plates 8 inches thick, diminishing at her extremities to a thickness of 6 inches, the inner skin being $1\frac{1}{2}$ inches thick. The main-deck port cills will be 8 feet out of the water, and the upper-deck port cills 16 feet. Her armament will consist of six broadside 12-ton guns on the main-deck, and a 64-pounder at both bow and stern. The peculiarity of these ships will be that they are to have a sort of semi-turret on the upper deck on each side, inside which two 12-ton guns will be mounted. There will be four ports—two on each side—giving a range of fire from a line with the keel to an angle of 90° from it. They will have nearly all the advantages of turret ships, while the disadvantage under which most turret-ships labour—that of being so low in the water as to prejudice the health of the crew—will be avoided. The weight of the hull of these ships will be 2,740 tons, the weight of the armour on their sides 850 tons, and of the backing 140 tons. These vessels will belong to the second-class of iron-clads; and of them we propose to build two. We also

Lord Henry Lennox

propose to build by contract ten gun-boats on the same principle as those in the dockyard. There is also an intention of building another of those ships of the Inconstant type, which were laid down by the late Board, and which are chiefly intended to protect our commerce and to harass that of the enemy. Some objections, it is true, have been taken to these vessels, one of which will come home to the feelings of Englishmen—that they go so fast that they need never come within reach of the enemy's guns—that is to say, that their best qualities will be shown in their powers of running away. Now, it is quite clear that our iron-clad vessels are eminently unfit for this service, because a ship which is to defend the commerce of our own ports or to harass that of an enemy must be a cruising ship, fit to keep the open sea for months, and able to go under canvas as well as under steam. These are the considerations which have induced the Admiralty to recommend that another ship of that description should form part of our scheme for this year. There are only two or three points more upon which I need trouble the Committee at any length. Public attention has lately been directed to a paper displaying much ability, written by Mr. Henwood. Now, I can quite understand the inquiry which has been made—Why, when you have got a quantity of magnificent wooden line-of-battle-ships blocking up your harbours and costing so much to the country, do you not cut them down into turret-ships and thus save expense and provide a navy? The Board of Admiralty, however, do not believe that Mr. Henwood's plan would result in obtaining either good or cheap ships. I desire to speak with the utmost respect of that gentleman, who is one of the most eminent shipbuilders in the country; but I must think that not being accustomed to build ships of war he has formed his conclusions rather hastily. His plan has this great drawback at starting, that he deals with ships many of which are worn by age and are weak, through having been converted from sailing vessels into screws, and are, therefore, more or less deteriorated and ill-fitted to bear another conversion. Many of them have engines which are partly worn out, and these would require new engines and extensive repairs. I have here a statement drawn up by the Controller of the Navy showing the results obtainable, under Mr. Henwood's plan, of conversion. Let us take, first, one of the ships best adapted to the purpose—the Victoria—and compare her with a ship well known to many hon. Gentlemen opposite—the Royal Sovereign. It may have the effect of changing Mr. Henwood's opinion as to his own plans. If the Victoria were cut down, the weight of her hull, without armour-plates or equipment, would be 3,724 tons, whereas that of the Royal Sovereign is 2,496 tons; the weight of her armour of all kinds would be 1,056 tons, that of the Royal Sovereign being 786 tons; the turrets and guns in them would weigh 1,028 tons, against the Royal Sovereign's 685, and her equipments would weigh 2,824 tons, compared with the 1,204 tons of the Royal Sovereign. The result would be that the Victoria would weigh 8,631 tons, and her deck would be only 2 feet 2½ inches above the water, whereas the Royal Sovereign weighs but 5,191 tons, and the height of her deck is 7 feet 1½ inches. I will just state what the height of deck above low-water line would be with different ships if they were converted on Mr. Henwood's principle, and fitted with the number of turrets contained in his proposal. That of the Duncan, if fitted with three turrets, would be 2 feet 8 inches; the Prince of Wales, with four turrets, 2 feet 1½ inches; the Renown, with three turrets, 1 foot 11 inches; the Windsor Castle, with three turrets, 1 foot 8½ inches; the London, with three turrets, 10 inches; the Howe, with four turrets, 8½ inches; and the Conqueror, with three turrets, 2 inches. Under these circumstances, the Board, I think, were amply justified in hesitating to cut down these ships upon plans so faulty and ill-considered. I hope, however, to show the Committee that we have tried to do our best to deserve the confidence of Parliament and the country. We have felt that there was a great objection to these line-of-battle-ships continuing to block up our harbours and rivers. On taking office we found fifty-five ships of the line blocking up our harbours and rivers, the value of which, including those in commission, is about £8,350,000, and to complete and repair which would cost £1,250,000. Each of these ships lying in reserve in our harbours costs at least £1,000 a year for shipkeepers, stokers, boats, moorings, repairs, and stores. Then there are the wages of the shipkeepers, stokers, and engineers, which for the whole of our reserves amount to £98,260 per annum. We must add to this the cost of wages under Vote 6, £15,000, and for stores £4,000 more, making a total of £117,260 a year as the cost of merely keeping up these ships in a proper condition. We felt that some of them were worthless as men-of-war, and could not by any process of conversion be made available for the service of the country. My right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) consulted with the Board, and it was decided that the time had come when the worst of these ships might with advantage be sold. Thirteen of the worst ships have consequently been disposed of, and within the current financial year £85,000 will be paid for them by Messrs. Castle and Beach and another firm at Devonport, into the Treasury. Of course, it is not for me to say positively whether any more of them can be sold at present; but I think my right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) has in this, as in many other things, shown that he was not crippled by "red tape" prejudices in the office which he had recently the honour to hold; but that he brought his sound common sense to bear on the question, and that, finding how much these ships were costing the country without any corresponding advantage, he decided to dispose of them on the best terms he could. They have been sold under new conditions for which my right hon. Friend is responsible, and I prefer that he should on another occasion explain the details of the manner in which it has been done. There is only one more Vote which I wish to touch upon, and it is one of the most costly Votes—namely, that for New Works, &c. Now, I wish to express my sense of the readiness which the various heads of Departments connected with the Admiralty have shown to give me full information, and the forbearance they have shown towards those who, like myself, enter office with no previous experience of official details. I am afraid the Vote for Works is generally rather extravagant; but this year there is a decrease of £4,277 over last year. The sum voted last year was £892,865, but of that a certain portion was not spent. The sum asked for this year is £888,588. This is caused by a large extension of dock accommodation at Chatham and Portsmouth. For this outlay the present Government are not responsible. The subject was carefully considered by a Committee of the House of Commons, and the present Board of Admiralty have had no option but to proceed with these works, which were sanctioned by an Act of Parliament. They were not proceeded with last year owing to the financial crisis, which rendered it inexpedient to ask for contracts. There is another item of £475,000 for extra receipts and re-payments, upon which I must offer some explanation. The item generally consists of a sum of £140,000, under this head it varies very little, and is generally calculated on an average over three years. A sum of £85,000 has been already got by the sale of ships, and my hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay) authorizes me to say he has not the slightest doubt that, without detriment to the public service, a sum of £150,000 may be obtained by the sale of timber, for some of which there is no present use, some of which has actually deteriorated, and other portions of which are in course of further deterioration. The present Board of Admiralty did not think it desirable to go to the expense of building sheds to cover this obsolete or deteriorating timber. My hon. and gallant Friend will be able to state more in detail than I can do the peculiar quality of this timber, some of which would for certain purposes find a ready sale in the market, especially the Honduras mahogany. I now come to the item in this Vote for pig-iron, to which the hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Seely) has called the attention of the House. Last autumn Messrs. Ryland, of Birmingham, whose firm is considered a leading one in the iron trade, applied for half a ton from each dockyard for the purpose of testing the quality of the iron. I thought there was no harm in giving them the iron, because if the hon. Member for Lincoln were wrong, it would give me the opportunity of putting him right, and if he were right it might give us a sum of £100,000 or £150,000 to be paid into the Exchequer. With that view half a ton of pig iron ballast was supplied to Messrs. Ryland from each of three dockyards, and at the same time a trial was conducted at Portsmouth Dockyard by Dr. Percy, under the direction of my hon. and gallant Friend (Sir John Hay). Dr. Percy has entirely corroborated the view taken by Messrs. Ryland that this iron might be sold at a high price. The Correspondence on this subject has been moved for and will be produced, and any further papers which will facilitate the inquiry of the hon. Member for Lincoln will be cheerfully given to him. I think the sum of £100,000 for pig iron ballast is a very moderate one, and I am borne out in that opinion by Mr. Ryland, with whom I have had several interviews and correspondence during the last month. Steps have already been taken practically to test the value by giving over to Messrs. Ryland fifty tons of the ballast stacked in Woolwich Dockyard. These items make up a total of £475,000, including £100,000 for pig iron ballast, £150,000 for timber, and £85,000 for sale of ships. And that is exclusive of eight or ten other ships, which it may be for the public advantage to sell, and the proceeds of which would swell the figures in this item. These are the proposals which, on behalf of the Government, I have to lay before the House. It is rather out of my line to deal with such masses of figures; but I have done my best to make them clear to the House, and in the course of the long discussion which will doubtless take place, I shall be ready to give any further explanation in my power. These proposals we believe to be moderate ones; they are the very least which the Government consider they ought to make, and if they are accepted we think that England may for the future, as she has done for generations past, rest with confidence on the navy as the right arm of her strength in the hour of danger.

Lord Henry Lennox

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That 67,300 Men and Boys be employed for the Sea and Coast Guard Services, for the year ending on the 31st day of March 1868, including 16,200 Royal Marines.”

MR. GLADSTONE: I am sure I only give expression to the feeling of the House when I congratulate my noble Friend on the manner in which he has discharged the duty intrusted to him. It was from no objection to him in his personal capacity that I raised a question in the early part of the evening. In listening to my noble Friend, I am bound to say, without entering into any details, that there were some points upon which, not only with regard to manner, but matter, I heard him with great satisfaction. I do not rise to intercept the discussion which usually succeeds this statement, but it also raises a wider question, which has been illustrated by the statements of the noble

Lord. So far from being disinclined to accept the noble Lord as the organ of the Government with respect to the Admiralty, there were some parts of his speech which led me to desire that he occupied a more prominent and important position than the one which he actually holds. He alluded to one question of great importance—the proposal to build a great number of new gunboats. The object is that they should be scattered over the whole world, with the view of maintaining on the present scale that system of manning every part of the globe with vessels that have no force of resistance, and which, instead of being a force of security, would either have to be defended or else run away at the first menace of danger. The noble Lord put a query of a most significant character, intimating that the opinion he entertains is adverse to that system. But it has been brought into peculiar prominence by the Estimate; because the large outlay proposed to be made this year will be followed by a very large outlay next year, which will arrest the progress of certain important vessels now being built intimately connected with the defence of the country. The noble Lord indeed made out my case; because, having adverted to this scattered force constituting one-third of the force of the British Navy, he stated with the utmost candour that it was not his business to announce a policy, or to give an opinion on the case. Many Gentlemen on this side of the House would like to take this opportunity of raising a question connected with this policy, because the building of this great number of small gunboats directly challenges the judgment of the House on this subject. It is natural that the Government, having come to these conclusions, should seek to embody them in the Estimates; but the noble Lord will see that the question is a very large one, not only with regard to the number of these gunboats, but because it tells directly on the number of men who will be required to man these gunboats in different parts of the world. I hope it will be understood that hon. Gentlemen who are desirous of discussing this question at large are not merely certain Gentlemen who have certain speeches in their minds of which they are anxious to get rid, but Gentlemen who wish to make an earnest appeal to those who are responsible in this matter, and particularly to those charged with the conduct of this Department—namely, the right hon. Gentleman the late First Lord of the Admiralty (Sir John Pakington) who has the most minute knowledge of the principles upon which, and the objects for which these Estimates are framed, and also to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Corry) who has succeeded him, and who, when he returns to this House, must assume the responsibility for them. Supposing Gentlemen on either side were to urge upon the noble Lord (Lord Henry Lennox) the most convincing arguments and statements in support of opinions which he might be inclined to embrace, he might repeat the answer he has given to-night in so many words—that he is not here to announce a policy. And that would be a good answer to us, not only because he is the Secretary to the Admiralty, but because he is not the representative of that Department in this House. If it were convenient for the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) and his Colleagues to make the noble Lord the representative of the Board of Admiralty in this House, I venture to say we should all be ready to accept him as such, and to treat him with as much courtesy as has been extended to any of his predecessors. As has been suggested by the hon. Member for Nottingham, I believe there is no occasion for a Vote on Account, although, if it were necessary, there would be no informality caused by that, because there might still be some reduction made upon the Votes upon the table. But, with a view of securing a clear field for the important and large discussion upon what I may call the principle of these Estimates, I should be glad to learn from the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) that this Vote for the number of men, which virtually fixes the scale of the establishment of the navy, will not be taken to-night. I do not now make the actual Motion that the Chairman report Progress, though I should be ready to do so if requisite.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Without troubling the House with many reasons, I would say that, perhaps upon the whole, it will be advisable not to press this Vote to-night, and we can report Progress. Since I last had the honour of addressing the House, a telegram has arrived from Ireland, informing us that the election of the First Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Corry) will take place on Tuesday, and not on Thursday, so that my right hon. Friend will probably be in his place on Thursday, to go on with these Estimates.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE said, he wished to ask respecting the production of a certain Return.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said that, as hon. Gentlemen opposite denied that he was the organ of the Admiralty in the House of Commons, it would be presumptuous on his part to commit his Chief in his absence on that matter.

MR. CHILDERS said, he wished to ask how many tons of iron ballast were represented by the £100,000, for which the noble Lord had taken credit?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, the iron was of various qualities, and he could not then state, with exactness, how many tons it would take to realize the £100,000. The Messrs. Ryland were of opinion that at least £100,000 could be paid into the Exchequer in the course of the financial year.

MR. CHILDERS said, he hoped that more precise information on this head would be given on Thursday.

SIR JOHN HAY said, there were about 36,000 tons of that ballast which might be got rid of; but it would not do to glut the market with it. From the price which it fetched, it would be necessary to deduct about £1 5s. a ton for the cost of repairing the yards with granite or other materials. The iron was of different qualities, and the estimated value varied from £2 15s. or £2 16s. per ton for about one-sixth of it, up to £5 or £6 per ton for some portions of it. It would be impossible to give the exact sum which might be expected from this source in the course of the next financial year, until the experiment of bringing the ballast into the market had been practically tried. The Admiralty, however, believed it would be a large sum, and it was put down at £100,000.

MR. CHILDERS said, he still thought the House would require to have clearer information as to how much money per ton that iron would yield. Separate accounts should be kept of the produce of the iron, and the cost of paving the dockyards. The skill and knowledge of the officers of the dockyard had been much impugned as to the value of the iron placed in their charge. It was said that a large portion of it was particularly good for the production of shot. If so it might be of great value if transferred to the War Office. On Thursday he hoped they would obtain more definite explanations on the matter.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. O'REILLY said, he wished to ask the date of the purchase of the surplus timber which the Admiralty were now going to sell. About five years ago £1,000,000 worth of timber was purchased, and when some Members wished to raise a discussion upon that purchase in the House they were told that they were too late, as the purchase had been made, although the Vote was only just then going before the House.

MR. SAMUDA said, he wished to ask several questions with reference to the two second-class iron-clads provided for by the Estimates. He wished to know if they were to be similar vessels, and if they were to be plated all over or only in the centre, at the extremities, and round the water-line? He also wished to know if the semi-circular projections which had been mentioned for guns would allow the guns to be fought below or above deck?

SIR JOHN HAY said, they were to be entirely armour-plated, with six and eight-inch plates. The projections would have three ports, taking guns working on pivots under cover. With regard to the purchase of the timber, it was difficult for him to say when it had all been purchased; but a considerable amount had been bought prior to 1860-1, when the great increase took place. Up to 1859-60, it was found that 60,000 loads of timber were sufficient for the supply of the various dockyards, and that establishment was never altered. But in 1860-1 the necessities of the service occasioned a considerable expenditure for timber—60,000 loads being expended in one year, so that three years' supply was used up in a single year. Very soon afterwards, in 1862, the process of wooden shipbuilding was changed into one of iron shipbuilding. At this moment there were 101,000 loads of timber in the dockyards, some portion of which was without cover, and deteriorating more rapidly in consequence. It was calculated that if the House agreed to the proposed plan of shipbuilding, as laid before it by the Government, 25,000 loads would be sufficient for the present year, and 18,000 or 20,000 in succeeding years. Out of the present amount, 35,000 or 40,000 loads might be disposed of, and it was assuming a low price to say that £5 a load would be obtained for it.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, that the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty had asked, but not answered the question, Why should more first-class iron-clads be built? He should be glad to know why.

SIR JOHN HAY said, there was no proposal before the Committee to build any first-class iron-clads. A turret ship on Captain Coles' principle was to be built; but he thought the Committee would be unanimously of opinion that such a step should be taken.

MR. HENRY SEYMOUR said, he hoped that other colonies, following the example of Victoria, would ask for iron-clads to protect them, at the same time providing for their maintenance. Places like Singapore and Hong Kong might, he thought, be defended by an iron-clad with a much smaller military force than was now required. There should be more iron-clads, and fewer wooden ships built. England should depend more on her navy than on her army, and then the Army Estimates might be considerably reduced. He wished to advert to the statement of the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty (Lord Henry Lennox), to the effect that the African squadron might be entirely dispensed with. If the large squadrons which we kept up in different parts of the world were dispensed with, single iron-clad vessels must take their place, because the commerce of England must be defended. He supposed the speech of the noble Lord was a kind of "feeler" to try what the opinion of the House might be, and if it were well received Her Majesty's Government might have some scheme to propose. The noble Lord shook his head; but he (Mr. Seymour) wished to know whether, if the opinion of the House were favourable, Her Majesty's Government would be disposed to substitute some other means of defence for those which we now employed, and also whether, if a Motion to do away with the African squadron were brought forward, the Government would support it?

SIR MORTON PETO said, that in the absence of those whose business it was to give an answer to such questions, the wisest course would be not to prolong the discussion. He begged, therefore, to move that the Chairman do report Progress.

Motion agreed to.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

COURT OF CHANCERY (IRELAND) BILL.
(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

[BILL 47.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. CHATTERTON) moved the second reading of this Bill. He said, that in 1861 and 1862 Commissions were issued to some of the most eminent Judges and practitioners of England and Ireland, to inquire into the practice and procedure of the Courts of Law and Equity. Among the members of the Commission were the present Lord Romilly, the Lord Chancellor of Ireland, the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas in Ireland, the Lord Justice of Appeal, Lord Cairns, the Attorney General for Ireland of that day, and Vice Chancellor Wood. Having made their inquiry they reported on the 27th of July, 1863. In consequence of that Report Bills were prepared by his hon. and learned Friends on the opposite side of the House, and it was one of those Bills of which he had now the honour to move the second reading. The object of the Bill was to reform the practice of the Court of Chancery in Ireland by assimilating it to the practice which prevailed in England. The measure was based upon the unanimous Report of the Commission, and was in almost every particular the same as the Bill which had been introduced by his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Portarlington. He was happy to say that he had always been a strong advocate of the measure, and in support of that assertion he might refer to the evidence which he had given on the subject, having come to the conclusion from his experience in the Court of Chancery in Ireland that such a reform was imperatively required. He believed he had the concurrence in that remark of as good an authority as any one could be, his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Mallow. When the Bill was introduced last Session it received in its earlier stages opposition from some who were then Members of the House. If they were now present they would be able to explain the grounds on which they opposed the Bill in its earlier stage; but when it came on for second reading on the 14th of May last year the present Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench in Ireland (Mr. Whiteside) stated that upon due consideration he withdrew his opposition, and was anxious to give the measure his best support. He moved that the Bill be now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Solicitor General for Ireland.)

MR. SULLIVAN said, he gave the Bill in its entirety his most cordial support; but he wished to explain the circumstances under which the passage of the Bill through Parliament had been delayed for three successive Sessions. The Royal Commissioners reported, so far back as the month of July in 1863, that the practice and procedure of the Court of Chancery in Ireland, as then existing, required great amendment, and the Commissioners suggested what the Amendment ought to be. Such a matter, affecting the administration of the law, was of the highest importance, as everybody was interested in having the rights of parties quickly and finally adjudicated upon with the smallest possible expense. The practice of the Irish Court of Chancery was, however, vicious in the extreme in both of these respects. The delays and expense were enormous, and the ultimate decisions in Appeals from the Masters' offices were excessively slow, not through the fault of the Judges, but because the system was so embarrassed and complicated. The existing practice of the Court of Chancery in Ireland was most cumbrous, and demanded instant remedy. The formalities that had to be gone through were very numerous and perplexing, and cost a great deal of time and money to litigants. The Royal Commission appointed to inquire into the matter reported that the practice of the Irish Chancery Court should be assimilated to that of England, with certain modifications applicable to the law of Ireland. Founded upon the recommendations of that Report, the Government then in office, in the year 1864, prepared and introduced a Bill to give effect to them, which were in consonance with the opinions of the ablest lawyers upon the subject. The Bill, however, was met with the most decided opposition on the part of the right hon. Gentleman who now occupied the distinguished position of Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench in Ireland (Mr. Whiteside), of another hon. and learned Gentleman now a puisne Judge (Mr. George), and of some few others who then sat upon the opposition Benches. The obstruction thus caused was the means of defeating the measure. The Bill was again introduced in the Session of 1865, the same course was adopted by its opponents, and it was again thrown out, although it sought to remedy a crying evil. In the year 1866 he himself assisted to introduce the Bill once more; but the promoters encountered the very same opposition as on the two former occasions, though it was supported by Lord Cairns and some of the Members of the present Government, and owing to various circumstances the attempt was again unsuccessful. There was great reason to complain of the conduct on this question of the two right hon. and learned Gentlemen of whom he had first made mention. He could not say that he regretted their absence from the House, inasmuch as they were now enjoying high judicial offices in Ireland. The present Government did right to introduce another measure upon this subject. The Bill now before the House was substantially the same Bill as was formerly brought forward. It was a measure that was greatly needed, and he should support it through all its stages. Great good would result from it, and his only regret was that it had not been passed into law three years and a half ago, when the proposal was first made.

The Solicitor General for Ireland

MR. WALPOLE said, he thought the measure was eminently desirable, considering the inconvenience and expense occasioned by the existing system. He was of opinion that the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had overstated the opposition which the Bill had received from those who sat on the same side of the House as the present Lord Chief Justice Whiteside, when he opposed the measure. It should not be inferred that all who sat on the same side of the House on that occasion countenanced the opposition given to the Bill. The Members of the present Government did not countenance the opposition offered to former Bills, and for many years he had taken every opportunity in that House of calling attention to the great delay and expense involved by the practice in the Irish Court of Chancery. The former Bills had received the support of the present Lord Cairns. He thought that instead of raking up old stories, it would be better to apply themselves to the passing the Bill, which it was acknowledged was much needed.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

METROPOLITAN POOR BILL.

(Mr. Hardy, Mr. Earle.)

[BILL 66.] THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Mr. Gathorne Hardy.)

MR. J. STUART MILL: I wish to make only one or two observations. This Bill effects a great improvement in the existing state of things, and the chief thing to be regretted is that it does not go further. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) has reserved to himself the decision of a point which he was urged by several deputations to decide by the Bill itself—namely, the extent and boundaries of the districts, each of which is to have an asylum to itself. I wish to urge upon the right hon. Gentleman the importance of making these districts large; as large as the present or future Parliamentary districts. Less than this will not answer the purpose; and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give us this evening some idea of what are his purposes on this subject. Another point of more importance is, that there should be created, to stand between the Poor Law Board and the local Boards, an intermediate representative body, which might be intrusted with the administration of the law concerning the metropolis as a whole, and which, although elected, might have the exercise delegated to it of some of the functions now reserved to the Poor Law Board. I much regret that the right hon. Gentleman has not taken powers to establish such an authority, for we know that he is himself favourable for it. The value of large bodies representing large constituencies, as compared with small bodies representing small districts, is indisputable. I will at present confine myself to suggesting one or two practical cases in which it will be found of importance. Take the case of an epidemic likely to affect the whole metropolis, but for the present confined to a single district. In that case the resources of the entire metropolis could, through the administration of the general Board, be applied to the district in which they were wanted. Something like this was done lately in apprehension of a visit of the cholera, by the establishment of a central committee sitting at the Mansion House. That committee centralized the charity of the whole of London. Again, there is the case of destitution confined to certain districts. In these cases the buildings and beds in some parts of the metropolis are empty, while in the districts suffering the distress they are crowded. The value of a central or intermediate Board between the Poor Law Board and the local bodies, to superintend the application of the resources of the whole metropolis to the immediate exigencies of the distressed districts, is in such cases obvious. This function might well be discharged by a Central Board composed partly of the ratepayers' nominees, and partly of persons selected by the Commissioners. Another most important consideration is that referring to the providing of food, medicine, and other necessities for the hospitals. In many cases, also, relief is most advantageously given in kind, which makes it very important that provision should be made for obtaining the best articles possible. To make contracts for the supply of these things is an operation for which no local or small body can be by many degrees so fit as is a central body either in point of efficiency or economy. Jobbing, which is inseparable from hole-and-corner proceedings, need not be apprehended in the case of a body representing the whole metropolis, making purchases on a large scale, and entering into large contracts competed for by opulent firms, for these transactions, being of a public nature, would be carried on under the eyes of the world, and subject to public criticism. No one can dispute, and the right hon. Gentleman must be perfectly aware, that efficiency and economy in contracts are better secured when the body which makes them must do so with publicity—when it stands conspicuous in the public eye. To any one disposed to object to the suggestion for creating an intermediate or central elected Board, like the one I am speaking of, that it is a step on the road to centralization, I would say that if the establishment of such an intermediate body be denied, the denial of it would be a far greater step towards centralization. The powers which such a body is best qualified to exercise have become indispensable. They will therefore be necessarily assumed by a purely Government Board, without any elected body at all—by the Poor Law Board. These are the suggestions I offer to the right hon. Gentleman, and the reasons by which I support them.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, he thought it must be evident to all that a Central Board—consisting partly of elected members, partly of representatives of the Government—was necessary, in order to obtain uniformity of system throughout the metropolis. It was the interest of the whole of the metropolis to cure the sick as rapidly as possible, and a Central Board could send the necessaries for the purpose to where they were immediately required, instead of allowing them to lie idle elsewhere, and it would be most useful in taking the contracts. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would carefully consider the matter.

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped that a clause would be introduced to the effect that every person, such as medical officers and others, claiming compensation under the Bill, should take any office under the Government for which his previous occupation rendered him eligible, and that in the event of a refusal he should not be entitled to compensation. The Act might involve great cost for compensation. A similar clause had been inserted in the Probate Act. He had always advocated the appointment of a Central Board, and he was glad to find that in this respect the views of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) had considerably approximated to his own. He thought it was the general opinion that there ought to be a distinct Board to manage the asylums for sick and fever patients. [MR. GATHORNE HARDY: Hear, hear!] Now, if one Central Board were constituted, we should have a foundation which could be built upon from time to time hereafter. He thought the concession which had been made, coupled with the provision since introduced into the Bill, that the Central Board might appoint committees to superintend matters of detail in different districts, would, to a great extent, meet the views enunciated by the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill.) He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would be encouraged by the support he had received to enlarge the powers of the Central Board, and extend them to other provisions which might very well be the subject of the general administration.

MR. READ said, that twelve months ago the House was legislating in a panic on the subject of the cattle plague, and he thought the House had passed the present Bill with a certain amount of excitement and enthusiasm, which no doubt was due to the popularity of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board (Mr. Gathorne Hardy.) If the right hon. Gentleman could take a lease of the office for a number of years, or for life, he, for one, should not object to the powers conferred by the Bill. But when it was considered what in a few months the Poor Law Board was likely to become, he thought it would be seen that, in all probability, the House had conferred upon it too much absolute authority. It ought not to be forgotten that the Poor Law Board had in its past career interposed the obstructions of routine, and in dealing with the poor had passed by the mountains whilst they had stumbled against the mole-hills. At all events, he hoped that the power delegated to the Poor Law Board of nominating one-third of the guardians would not be extended to other districts.

Sir Harry Verney

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he was in favour of local self-government. The House ought not to distrust the local authorities, who, after all, were our own flesh and blood. The Bill unfairly reflected upon them.

MR. GATHORNE HARDY: There is nothing, Sir, in this Bill to abolish local self-government. Indeed, under its provisions local government will have the fullest scope for its exertions. With regard to what has been said by the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton), I must confess that I am deeply indebted to him for the support which he has given to this measure. As to compensation, however, there is a difference between the case to which he has adverted and that which will arise under this Bill. In this case there has been no patronage conferred on the Poor Law Board, with the exception of the single office of Receiver. The patronage, whatever it is, remains with the local governors of the metropolis. All the Poor Law Board will have to do is to see that persons do not claim unnecessary or unreasonable compensation. The whole system of compensation was placed on the footing of the Bill purposely, because new arrangements will have to be made, and any officer having a certain district which is altered in any respect may refuse to continue in it, and he must, of course, take his chance with the rest, the Board, as an impartial body, looking to every case on its merits, and taking care that no injustice is done to him. With respect to the Central Board, adverted to by the hon. Member for Westminster (Mr. Stuart Mill), it seems to me that in the course of the next year or year and a half that must elapse, before any of these buildings can be completed or brought into operation, we shall see the working of the Act, and whether those whose work it is do their duty, and carry out the intentions of the House. If in the course of that time it should appear that new powers are wanted, even in the next Session of Parliament, there will be abundance of time to get those additional powers, if they be needed. The hon. Member for Norfolk (Mr. Read) was good enough to say that the Bill had been passed owing to popularity on my part. I should be sorry to think that it was. I believe that the Bill owes its popularity to the fact of the great grievances which were suffered by the poor, the great injustice which was done to the ratepayers in expending money in other objects than those intended, and the injustice which was done to the public, which was obliged to look on powerlessly and hopelessly while such evils existed. This is an attempt on my part to make a beginning to redress those evils. I am far from thinking that the measure is perfect in itself. It is a sketch which may hereafter be filled up. Whoever may succeed me, or however long I may remain in my present office, it is clear that the House has taken up the subject with reality and earnestness, and will not admit of any weak or faltering policy. For myself, I should not hesitate, on whatever side I may sit, to appeal to the House—by the whole body of which I gratefully feel that I have been supported on this occasion in carrying the Bill—to grant any new powers that may be required, in order that the sick and imbecile poor may have justice done to them, and that the money of the ratepayers may be duly expended.

MR. ALDERMAN LAWRENCE said, he considered this the most important measure respecting the management of the poor which had been passed since the new Poor Law. It had several great principles—to insure a better system of relief to the sick and aged poor, to make better provision in schools for the children of the poor; and, at the same time, to spread the expenses of that relief more equally on a different basis and over a larger area of the metropolis. He hoped this latter principle would be carried still further. The Union Assessment Act was a step in the right direction, this Bill was another step, but it must be carried out still further, so that the whole metropolis might be placed on one uniform and equal basis. He hoped this measure would not long be confined to the metropolis; it would have to be carried out in the different counties. Although there had been negligence in some parts, yet, taking the metropolis as a whole, the poor had been properly cared for, and the large body of guardians had done their duty without fee or reward. But with respect to the Poor Law Board, looking to its defective constitution, and the manner in which it had conducted the Department, it was well known that it was solely owing to the philanthropic exertions of a few public-spirited men—the most distinguished of whom was the late Mr. Walter—that, after a long course of agitation, they had succeeded in modifying the harsher features of the new Poor Law. Those who had the management of the Board had no right to take to themselves the credit of looking after the interests of the poor, while the guardians denied the poor their rights. Since its first formation down to the present time the Board had been restricting the guardians, remonstrating with them for spending so much money, and never urging them to spend more to provide better for the wants of the poor. It was only in later times that agitation from without had acted on the Poor Law Board, inducing them to take a more humane view of affairs. He denied that the Board had always been the protectors of the poor. He looked forward to the time when one-half the charge for the maintenance of the poor would be put on the Consolidated Fund. He thanked the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) for this Bill, which would be useful to the metropolis as a whole, and which he hoped was the first step towards spreading the taxation for the poor over the whole country. He believed that the present Bill would effect much good; but he looked forward to the time when the money required for the relief of the poor would be raised not merely on house property and land, but from all who had the means to contribute, whether they possessed this description of property or not.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

LYON KING OF ARMS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

(Sir Graham Montgomery, Mr. Secretary Walpole, Mr. Hunt.)

[BILL 44.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR GRAHAM MONTGOMERY moved the second reading of this Bill. He said that, under its provisions, the office of the Lyon King of Arms would be self-supporting. The Lyon King would have an allowance not exceeding £600 a year, and would be required to do his duty without a deputy. The Lyon Clerk also would discharge his duties in person; and a reduction would be made in the staff.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

GRAND JURIES (IRELAND) BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

MR. PEEL DAWSON moved for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the Laws relating to the Presentment of Public Money by Grand Juries in Ireland. He said, the object of the Bill was for the purpose of electing instead of nominating the associated cesspayers who acted with the magistrates at sessions, and for the purpose of preventing their numbers being swamped. Also for the appointment of a standing committee by the grand jury from assize to assize, in order to have a more efficient control over the county officers, and to afford a better opportunity of examining into the state of the county business before submitting it to the grand jury at the ensuing assizes. He had shown a draft of the Bill to the noble Lord the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Lord Naas), who had no objection to its introduction.

Motion agreed to.

Bill "to amend the Laws relating to the Presentment of Public Money by Grand Juries in Ireland," presented, and read the first time. [Bill 73.]

BANKRUPTCY BILL.

LEAVE. FIRST READING.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I rise, Sir, to move for leave to bring in a Bill to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to Bankruptcy in England. The laws relating to debtor and creditor are so important and so varied in character, and their details are so numerous, that to go into a full examination of the subject would require a very lengthened statement. But I am satisfied that the full discussion which this subject has received within the last few years, the evidence taken before the Select Committee of 1864, the Report of that Committee in 1865, and the Bill brought in by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer) last year, have all made the House so familiar with the question that on the present occasion, and until the Bill is in the hands of Members, I may compress what I have to say into a narrow compass. Indeed, I think I might have followed the example of the hon. and learned Member for Richmond, and laid the Bill on the table, deferring any statement till the second reading; but as the public mind has been so much directed to this matter, it may, perhaps, be as well that I should at once state the leading provisions of the measure. The principle of the bankrupt code is very simple. It is the just distribution of the assets of the insolvent debtor among his creditors. Whatever tends directly to that end ought to form part of the code; but whatever tends only indirectly to it should not form part of the code. There are many parts of the law of debtor and creditor which tend only indirectly to that end. Therefore, though I intend to ask for leave to introduce a Bill to abolish imprisonment for debt, I do not propose that such a provision should form part of the measure which I am now about to bring under the notice of the House. It is unnecessary to go back through three centuries of early legislation on the subject of bankruptcy. It may be sufficient to say, with reference to that legislation, that sometimes it was harsh and unjust to the debtor, and that sometimes it was unjust to the creditor; but after various fluctuations a more fixed character was given to it some thirty years ago. Before Lord Brougham's Act of 1831, in every fresh case of bankruptcy a new tribunal had to be constituted to administer the affairs of the bankrupt. The property was collected and distributed by the creditor's assignee, under the supervision of the Court of Bankruptcy, and the bankrupt's discharge was obtained upon the certificate of the Commissioners of Bankruptcy, on the consent in writing of a certain number of creditors being obtained. Of course, there were other provisions with reference to Acts of bankruptcy with which the House is familiar, and upon which I do not propose to dwell. The complaints that were made of this state of the law were of the following description. It was said that the constitution by commission under the Great Seal of a new tribunal every time a person became bankrupt was very clumsy and expensive, and I do not see how it was possible it could be otherwise; that the administration of the estate by assignees chosen by the creditors was found not to work well; that the estate was too much under the supervision of the court; that the assignees were not paid for the work they performed; that the only way to obtain payment for such work was to appoint a paid accountant; that when the estate got into the hands of professional men it was badly managed, and was eaten up by costs. Then, with regard to the certificate of discharge, it was alleged that it was most unfair to the bankrupt, inasmuch as he had to follow his creditors about in order to obtain their signatures, and that it was liable to abuse, and led to buying the consent of the creditors. In 1831 Lord Brougham introduced a measure, the material points of which were that it constituted a new tribunal, consisting of four Judges, six London Commissioners, assisted by registrars and official assignees in London, who were to collect and distribute the assets, the duties of the creditors' assignees, who were retained, being merely nominal. This Act established no local courts, although under it flats were to issue to country Commissioners. The system introduced by that Act was as loudly complained of as the one it had superseded. There was an over-supply of official force in London, and there was no sufficient supply of official force in the country. Between the years 1831 and 1849 no less than three Acts were passed, with the provisions of which I will not trouble the House further than to state that they abolished the Court of Review and the functions of the four Judges created in 1831, the duties being performed by the Commissioners; that they appointed district Commissioners with district jurisdiction—the appeal from both the London and the district Commissioners being to a Vice Chancellor sitting in the Court of Chancery; and that they appointed official assignees for the country as well as for London. During the interval an attempt was also made to alter the mode of effecting the bankrupt's discharge. Up to that time his discharge had been effected by consent of creditors in writing, and the modification introduced was that the certificate was to be obtained at a public meeting of the creditors, when they had an opportunity of giving their consent verbally, or of making objections to the granting of the certificates, which were weighed by the Commissioners, who granted or withheld the certificate according to the conduct of the bankrupt. Power was also given to the debtor to institute proceedings in bankruptcy against himself. What I have stated will show that there have been considerable fluctuations of opinion during the last thirty years upon the points under consideration. Up to the time I have mentioned no satisfactory provisions were in existence under which the creditors could arrange with their debtors, so that the majority could bind the minority. Since that period this question has been looked upon as a matter of great importance. The point was originally mooted by the merchants and bankers of London in 1848 presenting a memorial to the Lord Chancellor and the Attorney General, asking for some provision to be introduced into the law which would enable the majority of the creditors to bind the minority in any arrangement which they might come to among themselves. The memorial proposed that the requisite majority should be either six-sevenths of both value and number, or nine-tenths of either number or value. I wish particularly to call the attention of the House to the number of the majority suggested in that memorial, because ever since that period there has been a continual tendency to reduce the proportion of the majority. Following upon that memorial came the Consolidation Act of 1849, which introduced, I think, for the first time carefully considered provisions for enabling creditors to arrange with their debtors and for enabling the majority of creditors to bind the minority. The arrangement clauses were of three sorts—the first enabling an arrangement to be come to before bankruptcy, but under the control of the Court, a proportion of three-fifths being sufficient to bind the minority; the second enabling the creditors of an estate in bankruptcy to take it out of the Court of Bankruptcy by a resolution of nine-tenths of the creditors; and the third enabled the matter to be settled by deed apart from the Court if six-sevenths in number and value of the creditors could agree to such an alternative. The Act reduced the number of Commissioners from six to four. Some special provisions were introduced of a very stringent character to meet offences against the bankrupt laws, and for different kinds of offences imprisonment for life, or for periods of seven years, three years, or one year, was enacted. The discharge was also made more difficult, and certain specific offences, such as gambling and keeping false books, were heavily visited. Then there was a Royal Commission issued shortly afterwards, over which my right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department (Mr. Walpole) presided, containing gentlemen of great eminence in the legal profession and in the mercantile world, and they turned their attention especially to the arrangement clauses, and made their Report in 1854. They pointed out that the business of the Bankruptcy Court had fallen off; they referred to the complaints made of the facilities with which traders were enabled to deceive their creditors; and with respect to arrangements by deed, they showed that, as the law then stood, great facilities were given to the debtor to get up fictitious debts in order to secure an apparent majority of consenting creditors. The Commissioners also pointed out that the stringent character of the penal clauses of the Act of 1849 was very objectionable. So much, then, for what took place in 1854. It would be unpardonable in me if I passed over the attempt at legislation upon this subject made by Lord Derby's Administration in 1859. A Bill was then brought in by the present Lord Chancellor founded, to a great extent, on the Report of the Commissioners of 1854. The Bill was read a second time, and the provisions of that Bill formed the basis of most of the legislation that has since been proposed on this subject. If that Bill had been followed more closely, I should probably not have been troubling the House to-night. That Bill proposed the abolition of imprisonment for debt; it provided a complete scheme of arrangement between debtors and creditors, and power was given to the creditors to dispense with official assignees, and to take the estate into their own hands. That Bill, however, did not come down to this House. Then I come to the measure introduced by Lord Westbury in 1861. It is right to state that that Bill did not pass entirely as it was brought in by Lord Westbury; he did not carry all the provisions he desired, and therefore he is not to be regarded as responsible for every part of that measure. The first part of the measure related to the abolition of the Insolvent Court, and provided for the abolition of the difference between the trader and the non-trader, thus enabling the non-trader to take advantage of the bankrupt laws. Then, jurisdiction was given to the County Courts, in practice found to be a most important improvement; and the provisions for arrangements between debtor and creditor were advantageously modified. There were three classes of provisions—the first enabled the creditors to take the estate out of bankruptcy; the second constituted a change of the whole affair from bankruptcy to an arrangement with the creditor; and the third enabled an arrangement by deed to be come to without bankruptcy, and provision was made by which a proportion of creditors, representing three-fourths in value, were able to bind absolutely the whole of the creditors. The Act, however, has been found to work disadvantageously to dissenting creditors, the powers conferred on whom are insufficient. The difficulties have been these:—There was no sufficient opportunity for dissenting creditors to challenge the deed; secured creditors, notwithstanding their security, ranked equally with the rest in their claims on other portions of the property; and thirdly, there were no means of making the deed binding and conclusive in the Court of Bankruptcy, so as to prevent future litigation as to the validity of the deed. These three defects deprived the arrangements contemplated and sanctioned by that Act of much of their practical value. Discretionary power is also, by the Act of 1861, given under certain circumstances to suspend the certificate for a time, and power is given to subject the bankrupt to imprisonment. Power is also given to make orders touching the application of the bankrupt's future property for the purpose of payment of his debts. It is necessary also to refer to the state of things which existed previous to 1861 as to the future property of insolvents. Up to that time the Insolvent Court had dealt with non-traders; and on the surrender of all his property the insolvent was discharged from his debts, subject to this, that machinery was introduced which gave power to get at his future property. In practice what was done was this—that one-third of the property acquired by the insolvent either by gift, inheritance, or devolution, exclusive of his actual earnings, was as a general rule appropriated by the Commissioners for the payment of his past debts. I think that that provision was a very beneficial one. The Act of 1861 has now been tried for several years, and an opinion can be usefully pronounced upon it. The main objection made to it has been that it allowed too great an interference on the part of the court, and thereby prevented the creditors from managing the estate themselves, which it was said they would do with greater economy. It was accordingly recommended by a Committee over which the hon. Member for Southampton presided, and which carefully investigated the subject, that the creditors should be allowed to appoint a trustee of their own choice—that the particular estate in question should be handed over to them—that inspectors should be appointed from their own body, and it was considered by the Committee that under such arrangements the estate would be well and cheaply administered. I propose in this Bill unreservedly to adopt that part of the recommendations of the Committee in the fullest and amplest manner. There is an objection raised to this arrangement, founded upon the assertion that the creditors are often so supine that they cannot be got to attend to their own interests or to appoint a trustee. But that is no answer to such a proposition in cases where creditors are willing to appoint their own trustees. At the same time, no doubt in many cases creditors may be found too supine to act for their own interests, and in such cases it would be wrong to leave the estates of bankrupts, as it were derelict because the creditors will not appoint trustees. In respect to the number of cases in which the creditors have not appointed assignees, speaking of London alone, the total number of London adjudications in 1866 was 2,955, of which 1,673 were cases in which the creditors did not choose assignees. Those estates were, no doubt, very small, generally speaking, a large number of them being only from £200 to £300. Nevertheless, some provision ought to be made for such cases. I think, also, that in only about 56 per cent of the country cases have the creditors appointed assignees. I do not propose to create any new office for this purpose, or indeed to create a new office of any kind under the Bill. There will be a necessity for one or perhaps two provisional trustees, in regard to cases in which the creditors will not take the trouble to act for themselves, in whom, also, the property of all insolvents will be vested between the time of adjudication of bankruptcy and the appointment of a trustee. The registrars of the County Courts will perform the functions of the provisional trustees in their several districts, and one will probably suffice in the metropolis for all purposes of a provisional character. By a separate Bill I propose to abolish imprisonment for debt, except in cases of gross fraud and outrage. I propose as a consequence of this to extend the operation of the Small Debts Act from £20 to £50. I apprehend that the abolition of imprisonment for debt will greatly reduce the number of bankruptcies, inasmuch as there are at present a large number of cases in which there are no estates where men become bankrupts merely to escape imprisonment or to get out of prison. By placing the estate in the hands of trustees to be chosen by the creditors, the business of the Bankruptcy Court will be considerably diminished. The debts will be proved before the trustees, who will arrange the dividend: in cases of disputed debt only a question would arise for the interposition of the Judge or Commissioner. Indeed, the business of the Court will be reduced to these main points—namely, that of adjudication, or of determining whether the insolvent has brought himself within the operation of the bankrupt law; the examination of the bankrupt; the admission to proof of disputed debts; the question of the bankrupt's discharge, and the determination of questions arising under arrangement deeds. There must be opportunity given to creditors to challenge those deeds if they should be so disposed, and therefore the matter must be examined before a competent tribunal. That being the amount and character of the business to be done, the next question is, what is the best tribunal for the settlement of these questions? It does appear to me that the business to be disposed of will require to be done in local courts spread throughout the country. It appears to me that the business of this kind—subject, of course, to appeal—may be well done by the County Courts in London and the country. It may be quite right also to have Commissioners or Judges in London. I see, however, no reason why the County Courts in the metropolis may not have jurisdiction; and I think it desirable that one or more Commissioners in London should have jurisdiction over the whole of England. Their functions will be the same as the Judges of the county courts in bankruptcy. The system will then be as analogous as possible to that of Scotland, where sequestration can be taken out in the Sheriff's Courts all over the country, limited to their respective jurisdictions, and also in the Court of Session for the whole of Scotland. It is desirable that there should be one settled and complete system of local courts. I believe the County Courts are sufficient for all local purposes. There will be no new appointment of district Commissioners. There should not be district courts especially for settling questions between debtor and creditor, district courts for bankruptcy, and district courts for the Admiralty, but there should be one good set of local courts, and if the County Courts are not sufficient for the purpose, they should be made so. I do not propose, therefore, any new appointment of district Commissioners, although it will be convenient to continue existing Commissioners. The whole business of the Bankruptcy Courts will under this Bill be done by local courts, and the Judges in London will act in bankruptcy in the same way as County Court Judges, but their jurisdiction will extend over the whole of England. This departs to some extent from the system proposed by the Committee of 1865, which recommended—

The Attorney General

“That there should be established a Court of Bankruptcy in the metropolis, and the Judges of the Superior Courts of Equity and Common Law should sit as Judges in that court. That there should be an appeal to the Court of Bankruptcy from all orders of a County Court, or of a single Judge in the metropolis, relating to matters above the value of £20, and from all other orders when the court or Judge shall allow a special case for appeal.”

I am at a loss to conceive how that could be carried into effect. A court composed of Judges of law and equity to sit in bankruptcy would disturb the business of all the courts in the kingdom, and there would be great difficulty in getting the Judges together for this purpose. I am at a loss, also, to conceive what we want with a Court of Bankruptcy in London thus constituted, or, indeed, any court apart from the London Commissioners or Judges, with an appeal to a competent court. The Commissioners or Judges in London would have the whole jurisdiction in bankruptcy, extending over the whole of England, in which they would find important, and I believe ample judicial labour, and which they would ably discharge. I believe, as it now stands, you have the most satisfactory appellate court that could be made, the appeal to the Court of Chancery. I admit that that court is overworked; but I am not proposing to throw additional work upon that court. The appeals in bankruptcy now occupy, it may be, one day a week, and the House would surely not constitute a new court to do business that would only occupy one day a week, and I think that we should leave the Court of Appeal as it now stands. Of course, there is a great change going on in reference to winding-up public companies, and this creates business so vast, that if it continues it may be necessary to constitute some new tribunal. But at present, in considering the nature and character of the business to be transacted, I think that a great portion of business will be taken off the hands of the Court of Bankruptcy by the whole estate being put into the hands of the creditors. Another great part of the business is to be transacted by the registrars, and what remains afterwards will be most satisfactorily discharged by the County Court Judges with Commissioners or Judges in London, who will, however, have a jurisdiction over the whole of England. There is another point of considerable importance. In one of the recent Acts, power is given to the debtor to make himself bankrupt at his own option. At first it was done without any condition, afterwards upon the condition that the bankrupt should show 5s. in the pound. Last year it was proposed to take away the power of voluntary bankruptcy altogether. No doubt the voluntary power was open to abuse, but it was extremely useful in some cases. It will sometimes happen to the honest debtor that to distribute his property fairly he should have the power to prevent any one creditor from having execution against the whole of his property, and I think that this may be done in some such mode as this. Let the debtor petition the Court of Bankruptcy, and upon his petition let his property be protected from execution, and then let the creditors be called together and determine whether he shall be allowed to make himself a bankrupt or not. Then as to those arrangement clauses, which now enable the creditors to take the estate out of bankruptcy, leaving the debtor subject to the bankruptcy law, and the other clauses which take the whole affair out of bankruptcy. These work very well, and I do not propose to alter them. As to the arrangement clauses for preventing the affair going into bankruptcy at all, I have given great attention to this part of the subject, and I hope that part of the law may be considerably improved. If you take the estate out of the debtor and vest it in a provisional trustee, the moment he proposes to arrange with his creditors, he will not come to any such arrangement. His object is to continue his business, and if you take his estate out of him, and also say that no one shall be deemed a creditor until he proves his debt before the court, it would interpose such difficulty that there would be no arrangements at all. On the other hand, there is difficulty in allowing the debtor to make out his own list of creditors, for by so doing he is enabled to commit gross frauds on his bond fide creditors. Of course the object is to find some middle course, and what I propose is to this effect: that the debtor shall file a deed within a given number of days, after its execution, six or seven days, in the court having jurisdiction over him in the matter of bankruptcy, and that at the same time that he should file with that deed a list of his debts, and an account of his property, and that the fact of filing shall forthwith be gazetted. The deed is to be deemed completely executed when it is assented to by a majority in number and three-fourths in value of the creditors. Of course, it will be for the House to consider whether this shall be the proportion; but if provision is offered for the creditors satisfying themselves as to the fairness of the arrangement, I think that three-fourths in value will be sufficient. Creditors who are secured must deduct their securities from their debts before they are comprised in the list of consenting creditors. Such a deed when executed can now be challenged in any court in the kingdom; but I propose to remedy that by providing that the Court of Bankruptcy shall within three months declare whether it is or is not completely executed, and whether it is or is not a valid deed. There will be every opportunity of challenging the deed if there be anything wrong in it within the period of three months; but it must be challenged in the court where it is filed, and the numerous actions arising in the other courts upon such deeds will thus be put an end to. This, I think, will remove all the objections that now exist to these arrangements by deed; and, if so, I think that we shall have gone a long way in accomplishing an object admitted on all hands to be desirable. Then, as to the discharge of the bankrupt. Here I admit that there is very great difficulty. The old system looks, at first sight, very plausible; that the bankrupt should be discharged if the Commissioner sees no reason to say that he had not conformed to the law, provided that his creditors assented. But it is impossible to go back to that; it has been, as I have said, found very vague and unsatisfactory, and it is equally difficult to define the particular offences for which certificates should be refused. It is, no doubt, quite right to say that if a bankrupt has got into debt fraudulently he should not have his certificate; but beyond that I find it very difficult to say upon what special grounds the certificate should be refused. The Committee of 1865 recommended that wherever a bankrupt had made a full disclosure and surrender of all his property, and paid 6s. 8d. in the pound to his creditors, he should be free from all claims capable of proof in bankruptcy; and in all other cases where there was a full disclosure and surrender he should be free from all such claims after the expiration of six years from the adjudication. I have had very many objections made to me as to this proposed mode of granting these discharges. A man, it is said, is getting into difficulties, he finds he can pay 4s. or 5s. in the pound, he has credit, and he sees that if he can get some £300 or £400 worth of goods more, or, if he be in a larger way of business, some £3,000 or £4,000 worth, he will be able to pay 6s. 8d. in the pound. Now, gentlemen of experience assure me that a man in this position will very commonly resort to the practice of contracting further debts of this kind. And now the question is what are we to do? If he does not pay 6s. 8d. in the pound he has to wait six years. I know of no way of safely making the payment of 6s. 8d. in the pound a condition of obtaining the certificate, unless to say that in no case shall he have his certificate for less than twelve months, and not then unless he pays 6s. 8d. But this would not be satisfactory, nor is it satisfactory, to say that, as a matter of course, merely because he conforms to the bankruptcy law, he shall be entitled at once to his discharge. I think there is no alternative but to resort to the principle of the Insolvent Debtors' Act—that is, to make his future property liable at the discretion of the Court to his past debts, and let him have his discharge at once. I would not leave the discharge to the discretion of the Judge, except in cases of direct violation of the Bankruptcy Act; in all other cases I would say, "Unless you pay 10s. in the pound your future property shall be liable, subject to the payment, in the first place, of your future debts, until you make up a dividend of 10s. in the pound," or such other sum as may be thought proper. If the matter were new, if we had not proceeded on a contrary principle of legislation for three or four centuries, I think we might have gone farther than that. The basis of all legislation on the subject of debtor and creditor should be to insure the performance of the contract. In all such legislation the remedy should be cognate with the contract, but it is not so if you propose to imprison the debtor. He has contracted to pay money for money's worth; to imprison him does not necessarily tend to the performance of that contract; to provide that if at any time he has the means of paying he shall pay, does tend directly to insure its performance; and if I do not propose to make him do so to the full, it is because we have legislated on a contrary principle for so long a time. These are the principal outlines of the Bill. The subject is a very large one, and grows under one's hand, the details are so numerous. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Richmond (Sir Roundell Palmer), whose absence to-night I very much regret, has placed at my disposal all the communications he has received and all his papers upon the subject, and, of course, I have derived great assistance from them. At the same time, there are one or two points on which I have not followed his Bill, especially with regard to the discharge of the bankrupt. I have also had the example of what is done in Scotland. I have had every facility that any one could have in framing my Bill, and it is my fault if it be not a good one. Of course, there are a great many difficulties in the subject—in point of detail, it is extremely hard to realize everything that is desirable; but when hon. Members have the Bill in their hands, as I hope they will in a very short time, I trust it will be found a satisfactory basis for legislation of a permanent character, and not merely one of a series of attempts at legislation, destined in its turn to be shortly swept away by some new measure. Sir, I beg to move for leave to bring in the Bill.

The Attorney General

The Attorney General

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to consolidate and amend the Acts relating to Bankruptcy in England."

MR. GOSCHEN said, that having been a Member of the Select Committee of 1865, and as representing a commercial community, he wished to say that he had listened to the able statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman with a great deal of pleasure. Without being as yet able to judge of the Bill as a whole, he thought that the commercial world would be satisfied with many of the proposals contained in it. The questions connected with bankruptcy fell under two heads—questions of principle and questions of administration. The former related to all matters connected with the discharge and punishment of the debtor, and to such matters as whether a majority of creditors should bind a minority and so on. The question of administration was a subordinate one, which had reference chiefly to the mode in which the assets should be collected and distributed, and to the best kind of tribunal for that purpose. The hon. and learned Gentleman had truly said that the chief element in a bankruptcy law was a just distribution of the assets; but he thought it would be admitted that at the bottom of the whole system was the question of discharge and the future liability of the property of the bankrupt. The hon. and learned Gentleman had stated that he had abandoned the recommendation of the Select Committee of 1858; that the discharge of the bankrupt should only be granted after a payment of a dividend of 6s. 8d. in the pound; and that the bankrupt should remain without his discharge for a period of six years, if the dividend did not reach that figure. He was glad that the hon. and learned Gentleman had abandoned those suggestions. Great difficulties surrounded them, and he did not think that they had met with the favour of the commercial world. He was aware of the objection alluded to by the hon. and learned Gentleman, of the debtor going on, after he was practically insolvent, in the hope of reaching a 6s. 8d. dividend, but that was not the chief objection to the system. The idea of the Committee was, that unless it was made to be the interest of the debtor to pay a certain dividend he would go on trading to the last, and would by so doing swallow up all his assets. It was that consideration that induced the Committee to recommend that his discharge should have relation to a dividend of 6s. 8d. But very often the value of a trader's assets underwent violent fluctuations, from causes beyond his control, and was lessened thereby much more than it would be by a long course of injudicious trading. A crisis like that of last year might render the assets unequal to the payment of a dividend of 6s. 8d., and that from no fault of the bankrupt, as the blame might be much less than in cases occurring at ordinary times yielding 15s. That criterion, therefore, could not be considered a safe one, though it was difficult to find a better. With regard to the question of the liability of the future property of the debtor, he agreed with the Attorney General that, on public grounds, it would be unadvisable to impede the future progress of a man who had become bankrupt by making him, at all periods of his life, subject to the claims of his original creditors. At the same time, great scandal was unquestionably occasioned when it happened that a man rose to great wealth, and yet failed to pay his creditors a single halfpenny of what he owed them under a previous bankruptcy. Under the Insolvent Debtors' Act the money that a man, under such circumstances, acquired, by bequest or inheritance, was made liable; that which he earned was exclusively his own—a distinction which seemed to him to be a reasonable and proper one. The plan sketched out by the Attorney General might contain the elements of a successful settlement of this question; but until the Bill was before the House it was impossible to express any definite opinion on the point. It was wise to place a bankrupt not at the discretion of individual creditors, but at that of the court, and to make only a portion of his future property liable for his former debts. He was glad that the hon. and learned Gentleman had adopted the plan of placing the administration of the assets of a bankrupt in the hands of the creditors as far as possible; and he was glad also that he proposed to remove the punishment of the debtors, in cases where punishment was due, altogether from the Bankruptcy Law, because at present it frequently happened that the creditors who desired to punish a fraudulent debtor could only do it by wasting a portion of their assets in the prosecution of him. He would also say, in reference to another topic touched upon by the hon. and learned Gentleman, that there was a strong feeling among the mercantile classes in favour of the appointment of a Judge of the same rank and standing as the other Judges of the land, who should make these cases—like Admiralty and Divorce cases were—his exclusive department. He did not consider the Court of Chancery a satisfactory Court of Appeal for cases of mercantile bankruptcy; and he thought that the whole question of the tribunal would have to be carefully considered by the House in Committee on the Bill. With regard to the deeds of inspection and assignment, he could not but express the opinion that the system of winding-up under inspection had been a fertile source of every description of fraud, and that it generally meant only a winding-up under a friendly accountant or a friendly solicitor. It would be better, he thought, so to deal with the Court of Bankruptcy as to attract the estates of bankrupts to that court, rather than to encourage the making of deeds of inspection and assignment. As he had said, the creditors were, in his opinion, much better able to collect the assets than anybody else could be; but it was doubtful whether they were equally capable of distributing them equitably under deeds of inspection and assignment, and it might be well that the court should be held, in some degree, in terrorem over them, to take care that the distribution was just. The hon. and learned Gentleman had not alluded to the question of expense; but if the machinery he proposed could be placed in the hands of the creditors, the great cost which now frightened people from having anything to do with the Court of Bankruptcy would, he hoped, be avoided. It was difficult to advance any opinion upon the Bill before it was in the hands of the House; but he thought that, while it would require important modifications in Committee, it contained many valuable suggestions, and many proposals which would be received with great satisfaction by the commercial world.

MR. MOFFATT said, he considered that the Bill would meet with great approval on the part of all interested in it; but he should have been glad if the hon. and learned Gentleman had acted more boldly on the sound principles contained in the latter part of his speech, and if he would explain more distinctly how he proposed to deal with the 600 gentlemen, or thereabouts, who made themselves bankrupts every year, who paid not a farthing in the pound, and always obtained their discharge. He should also be glad to be informed what was for the future to constitute an act of bankruptcy—whether it was to be involved in the present difficulties that surrounded it, or to consist of some simple act about which no doubt could exist. There were 8,100 bankrupts last year. Of these 170 had paid 10*s.* and upwards in the pound; 600 paid nothing at all. As a rule it might be said that when a trader was only able to pay 2*s.* in the pound he must have known for some time that his affairs had not been in a solvent state. When a man became unfortunate the most advantageous method for himself and his creditors was to settle his affairs by a composition deed, for he could better manage his estate for himself and his creditors than any one could do it for him. Of 1,210 compositions 127 paid more than 10*s.* That showed that the method of composition was the most satisfactory settlement for the creditor. The bankruptcy laws afforded facilities for every kind of fraud, for if the creditors would not accept a composition the man could at once take the benefit of the Act. He believed the present Bill would to some degree obviate the evils of the present system; but he could not entertain the hope that it would effect any material improvement. He hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would give the matter further consideration, and that some modifications of its provisions would be introduced in Committee.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought that two or three Resolutions which he submitted to the Committee upstairs had not received from the Attorney General the justice to which they were entitled. One was a proposition that imprisonment for debt should be abolished, instead of which the Attorney General was going to aggravate imprisonment for debt and make it more unjust to numerically the larger portion of Her Majesty's subjects, who had not the advantage of getting into debt to the extent of £20. At present the humbler classes were brought before local courts, were ordered to pay money, and in default were imprisoned again and again, so that in some cases they were kept in prison for two years, while those who owed debts above £20 were waited upon by an officer of the court and invited to go out of prison. The Attorney General now proposed to enlarge the power of imprisonment for debts to £50. He hoped the House would put the poorer classes of society on the same footing as the richer who incurred debts to a larger amount. The next point in the Resolutions of the Committee was, as to what constituted an act of bankruptcy, and the Committee recommended that it should be so simple that it could not become the subject of litigation. They intended bankruptcy to be a substitution for imprisonment for debt—that it should be a formal sort of proceeding, a mere record of the fact—having the effect of transferring the man's property to his creditors. The principle involved in that Resolution was that the legal settlement was to be formal, and that the substantial element was to be commercial, so that the administration of the bankrupt's estate would be the carrying on or winding-up of the business in the ordinary way. The Committee thought that the creditors were the best persons to look after the property. With regard to the Attorney General's method of dealing with the bankrupt, it was the only one that could be adopted—namely, that all his future acquired property should be made available to discharge the debts contracted under the bankruptcy. When the Act of 1860 was under discussion he himself succeeded in introducing into it a provision making the future acquired property of traders, under certain conditions, liable for their past debts; but he believed that in the Bankruptcy Court that provision had hardly ever been put in force. He was glad that the Attorney General had now adopted that principle; but he would ask him whether there was to be no limit of time fixed as to its operation, or whether it was to apply during the whole of the bankrupt's life? If there were no limit it would not be satisfactory. The Select Committee which sat on that subject having determined that the administration of bankruptcies should be a very simple matter, scarcely ever requiring the intervention of the judicial mind, they suggested that the County Courts should have a bankruptcy jurisdiction, but that there should be one court in London with that jurisdiction, though without a Judge specially appointed for it. In that one court the ordinary business of bankruptcies in the metropolis might be transacted; and the aid of the Judges of the land might easily be called in—as was the case in the Central Criminal Court—whenever any legal difficulty arose, or any matter about which there was contention by counsel. The Resolutions of the Committee were not so chimerical or impracticable as the Attorney General seemed to imagine. With regard to deeds of composition, they were very often a cover for fraud and a contrivance of lawyers and others for plundering the bankrupt's estate and cheating the creditors. If the Bill were properly framed those deeds would be rendered wholly unnecessary. The law ought to be extremely comprehensive, giving the greatest power to the creditors for regulating the mode of dealing with the assets, but not enabling them to discharge the debtor from liability to the creditor without the latter's consent—which he thought monstrous. He was glad that the Attorney General had taken up that subject, and believed that he would receive every assistance from that (the Opposition) side of the House in passing his measure in a satisfactory shape.

Mr. Moffatt

MR. FAWCETT said, he wished to express his sincere gratification at the attempt of the learned Attorney General to introduce a sound principle into the bankruptcy law of this country, by making the future acquired property of the bankrupt liable for his previous debts. That House would, he thought, be only performing one of its clearest duties by doing something to correct the lax commercial morality of the present age. He knew of nothing which would be likely to cast a greater gloom over our commercial prestige than if one were to go into our large towns, the centres of our industry, and make out a list of all the men living extravagantly who, having failed, had not had the honour or honesty to pay their past debts. The hon. and learned Gentleman, if he could introduce some amendment of the law calculated to alter that state of things, would in his opinion richly deserve the gratitude of his country.

MR. MONCREIFF said, he thought the measure which the Attorney General had submitted to the notice of the House was one which was likely to be productive of great advantage in dealing with a very difficult question. He wished, however, to observe that he had not heard the hon. and learned Gentleman make any allusion in the course of his statement to the taxation of the bills of costs of solicitors and assignees in bankruptcy. Unless that taxation was taken out of the hands of local officers and placed in the hands of officers entirely removed from local influences, the hon. and learned Gentleman's meritorious labours would fail to produce their due effect. He suggested the appointment of an accountant in bankruptcy. It had worked most successfully in the Scotch measure of 1856.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he thought that many of the clauses of the Bill would operate very usefully. Much scandal arose from the fact that so many persons became bankrupts and again set up immediately in business—living extravagantly and without the slightest wish apparently to pay their just debts. He knew thousands of instances in which that had been done, and he was of opinion that in all cases in which a man failed to pay what was justly and lawfully due from him, he should have some penalty imposed upon him, such as that he should not be permitted to enter into business afresh to repeat perhaps the same conduct. If that were done we should not have one quarter of the bankrupts we now had. The present position of the bankruptcy laws was a disgrace to the country. What they wanted was an administration of the law which would be easy, cheap, and speedy; and no doubt the Bill would tend to that end.

MR. VANCE said, he thought the Attorney General had done rightly in departing from some of the Resolutions of the Committee. He approved of the Bill. Much had been said about the facilities offered for, and the frauds which had been committed under, deeds of composition and deeds of assignment. Those frauds, he believed, had been chiefly occasioned by the departure, in 1862, from the principle enacted in 1859, that all those deeds should come under the supervision of the Court of Bankruptcy, and that the court should determine in every case whether it was a proper case for composition. At present those deeds never went before any court, and there was no tribunal to which a creditor could go to prevent a bankrupt from entering into a composition to defraud creditors of their just rights. He approved of the suggestion for having a special court of jurisdiction in London for bankrupts, and he thought the appeal cases could go very well as they did at present—to the Lords Justices.

MR. NORWOOD said, that the objection to utilizing the local County Courts, which was alleged to exist in London, did not prevail in the provinces, which would be glad to obtain through them a ready and cheap access to justice. Their jurisdiction might be extended, if the Judges were adequately remunerated, and that extension would relieve the Superior Courts of much business. Three months was too long to allow a deed to remain open, and it might be closed in one or two months upon due notice being given. The winding-up of the estates of deceased insolvents had not been mentioned. He hoped it had not been lost sight of.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was of unquestionable importance to encourage commerce, but it was equally important to avoid encouraging rash speculation which proceeded upon the calculation, "If I succeed the profit is mine; if I fail the loss is my creditors." The question of what acts constitute a bankruptcy was not referred to at all in the Report of the Committee; but there were, of course, many tests of bankruptcy, such as a debtor's declaration of insolvency, a trader-debtor summons, and the failure to pay a debt or to give security. He did not admit that the Bill aggravated the law of imprisonment for debt; but he would not release a debtor from attachment made by a court of competent jurisdiction after due consideration of the circumstances of his indebtedness, for there were cases in which it would not be right to abolish imprisonment for debt. The expenses which had been referred to by his right hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh could only be regulated by taxation; but the services of an accountant might be dispensed with. The estates of deceased insolvents were administered so cheaply, and, indeed, were so wholly a matter of administration in the Chambers of the Vice Chancellor, and so far removed from the jurisdiction of counsel and of courts, that he knew little about them, but he believed that new provisions were scarcely necessary. He would consider the remarks that had been made, and do all he could to give effect to the views of hon. Members.

Motion agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 74.]

MINES.

Select Committee on Mines to consist of seventeen Members:—Mr. BRUCE, Mr. LIDDELL, Mr. NEATE, Mr. GREENALL, Mr. FAWCETT, Sir PHILIP EGERTON, Mr. KINNAIRD, Mr. POWELL, Mr. AYRTON, General DUNNE, Mr. CLIVE, Mr. HUSSEY VIVIAN, Viscount CRANBOURNE, Mr. WOODS, Mr. WILLIAM ORME FOSTER, and Mr. BROMLEY:—Power to send for persons, papers, and records; Five to be the quorum.

Mr. Norwood

JUDGMENT DEBTORS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Bill to abolish arrest on final process in civil actions in England, except in certain cases; and otherwise to amend the Law relating to Judgments, Decrees, and Orders, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 75.]

BANKRUPTCY ACTS REPEAL BILL.

On Motion of Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Bill to repeal enactments relating to Bankruptcy in England, and to matters connected therewith, ordered to be brought in by Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. Secretary WALPOLE, and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL.

Bill presented, and read the first time. [Bill 76.]

House adjourned at a quarter before One o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, March 15, 1867.

MINUTES.]—SELECT COMMITTEE—On Hypothec Amendment (Scotland) nominated.

PUBLIC BILLS—First Reading—Metropolitan Poor* (45.)

Second Reading—(£369,118 5s. 6d.) Consolidated Fund*; Shipping Local Dues* (41).

Committee—Traffic Regulation (Metropolis) (35 & 46).

TURKEY—TURKISH FORTRESSES IN SERVIA.

NOTICE OF MOTION WITHDRAWN.

THE EARL OF DERBY: Seeing the noble Earl (Earl Russell) in his place who has given notice of his intention to move for papers on the subject of the Turkish Fortresses in Servia, I have a communication to make which may, perhaps, induce him to think it unnecessary to bring on the subject. My Lords, I hold in my hand papers connected with the discussion which has taken place between Servia and the Porte, and which I am prepared, by Her Majesty's command, to lay upon the table. I have the satisfaction of announcing at the same time that an arrangement has been come to between the Porte and the Prince of Servia, which is perfectly satisfactory to both parties. The Porte has consented not to demolish or destroy the fortress of Belgrade, which is no longer necessary for the defence of the frontiers of Turkey; but which, nevertheless, is connected most closely with the most glorious memories of the Turkish Empire, and has a very strong hold on the feelings and affections of the Turkish subjects of the Porte. It has consented, moreover, to make over the fortress to the Government of the Prince of Servia. The fortress of Belgrade will be hereafter garrisoned exclusively by Servian troops, subject only to the condition that the Turkish flag flies over the fortress. That is the latest information contained in the despatches which I have to lay on the table. But I may add that the Turkish Ambassador has been good enough to furnish me with a telegram received from Constantinople, dated yesterday, stating with respect to these arrangements that they have been received with great enthusiasm in Servia. I think I may take this opportunity of saying also, with reference to a question connected with Turkish affairs in general, and the discussion brought on the other evening by the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Argyll), that a despatch had been received at the Foreign Office to-day from Lord Lyons, dated the 6th of March, in which he says that he had a long and serious conversation with the Grand Vizier, Aali Pasha, upon the internal condition of the Empire, in which his Highness assured him that the Turkish Government were determined as soon as possible to introduce reforms, and that one of the main objects of these reforms would be to improve the condition of the Christian subjects of the Porte, to open to them a career in the public service, and to do away with those distinctions between the Christian and Mussulman subjects of the Porte which, though in a great measure abolished by law, are still practically kept up. The despatch also states that a Christian has been appointed Assistant Finance Minister and Governor of the Bank, and that this was the commencement of reforms in the selection of Christians for honourable posts in the public service. It was, moreover, intended to extend the system of uniting numerous Pashalics in large Provinces under one Governor General, and to provide for the future representation of Christians in these large districts. Although this despatch does not refer immediately to the affairs of Turkey, I thought that your Lordships would be glad to hear that the Porte is not indisposed to act on advice and friendly counsels, and to introduce, I hope faithfully and honestly, improvements in the condition of its Christian subjects.

EARL RUSSELL: As my only object was to elicit information, I certainly will not persevere in the Motion of which I have given notice, and am much gratified by the information the noble Earl has given the House as to the intentions of the Porte. I would call the noble Earl's attention to a telegram which is dated Vienna, March 14, and which says—

“The Porte has consented to evacuate the Servian fortresses in consideration of the promises of the Great Powers that the sovereignty of Turkey over Servia shall be maintained.”

Is that telegram correct?

THE EARL OF DERBY: I have not seen the telegram to which the noble Earl refers; but the understanding clearly is that the suzerainty of the Porte over Servia will still be maintained; but with regard to its internal affairs Servia will be practically independent.

PARLIAMENTARY REFORM.

PETITION PRESENTED.

EARL GREY said: I have given formal notice of my intention to present the Petition on Parliamentary Reform which I hold in my hand, because, while I do not in all particulars concur with the petitioners, their views are, I think, in general so sound, that I am anxious to recommend them to your Lordships' serious consideration. This petition, which is from certain electors of the town of Wolverhampton, after referring to the fact that the question of Reform is again under the consideration of Parliament, says—

“That the alteration of the electoral law is the most important and difficult subject on which the attention of the Legislature can be engaged, since its results will give a direction for good or for evil to the conduct of public affairs in all future time. That in the proposals that have yet been made there appears to have been no distinct principle—nothing beyond concessions, more or less timorous, to the demand for change; nothing that could long be of service either in establishing a settled order of things, or in providing the rules by which further changes should be directed. That the Constitution of England has never recognised in every inhabitant a right to share in the Government or in the election of those who govern, but has required some qualification for every voter. That while the claims of education to a voice in public affairs have been recognised in the seats given to the Universities, yet the principal qualifications insisted upon have been, on the one hand, the possession of real property, and on the other the performance of public duties, and in particular the payment of public claims; and that, speaking generally, the former has been considered the proper franchise for counties, and the latter for boroughs. That many householders who are not resident in boroughs have to perform, and do perform, public duties, and take their full share in the support of the poor, and in the payment of property and other taxes; and your petitioners believe are worthy of being placed, as far as practicable, on a footing of equality with the burgesses of represented towns, but that if all such householders are added to the county constituency the representation of the freeholders as a class will be practically annihilated. That this difficulty can only be met by including as much as possible of the counties in some borough."

What I understand to be the view of the petitioners is, that by a large extension of the borough boundaries, larger and more independent constituencies might be secured for these towns, the right of voting would be given to a class well adapted to exercise the privilege with advantage, and, at the same time, the character of the county representation, as mainly a representation of property, would be preserved. Such would be the effect of what they propose, since, under the existing law, householders within the enlarged boundaries of the boroughs would vote for the boroughs, while freeholders would still retain their votes for the counties. So understanding the views of the petitioners, I am disposed to concur in them. The petition then proceeds to state—

"That the same complete revision and extension of the borough system is rendered necessary by the inequalities in the distribution of seats—inequalities so great as to give to two and a half millions of people in towns of less than 50,000 each a greater weight than to ten and a half millions living in the counties, and more than twice the power held by six millions of people in large towns and cities; and that the proposals hitherto made for curing this evil have been utterly inadequate. That while the system of equal electoral districts is opposed to the character of our Government, and while the history and circumstances of each locality should be duly considered, yet it cannot possibly be right to give to towns of 10,000 inhabitants the same weight in Parliament with towns and counties of 200,000, and that some limit ought to be fixed, beyond which such disproportion should not be permitted."

In this part of the petition I entirely concur. One of the first conditions of a good Reform Bill is that it should hold out the prospect of settling the question at least for a considerable number of years, and should not render it necessary that we should soon be again involved in all the difficulties and dangers of a farther change in the Constitution. But no arrangement can be durable which fails to remedy the crying inequalities of the present system. I trust, therefore, Parliament will consent to no measure of Reform which does not deal with this question of the re-distribution of seats in a bolder spirit, and on a larger scale than has hitherto been proposed. It is the more necessary to do so, because I am convinced that it will be requisite to have a greater number of seats to dispose of than is usually supposed. By an extension of the franchise you will necessarily increase the influence of the class that enjoys the smallest advantages of education. At the same time, by disfranchising small boroughs in whole or in part, you will diminish the means by which professional men, and men of ability who do not possess local influence, now practically find their way into Parliament. You ought, therefore, to provide some new facilities for admitting Members of this kind into the House of Commons, at the same time that you adopt measures having an opposite tendency. For this purpose it will, I think, be most desirable to increase the number of seats at the disposal of constituencies, in which the right of voting depends not on the occupation of property, or on residing in any particular place, but on some qualification which implies a superior education. The only constituencies of this kind which now exist are the Universities; and, in my opinion, a good Reform Bill ought to provide both for increasing the number of Members now returned by the Universities, and also for creating new constituencies of the same character. The London and Durham Universities together would form an excellent constituency of this sort. So would the Scotch Universities; and the Inns of Court, as representing the legal profession, would furnish another. The last, I think, would be particularly useful. Different Administrations have been compelled to look to what are virtually nomination boroughs for the means of bringing their Law Officers into Parliament, and it has been extremely convenient that they should be able to do so. This resource will no longer exist when a new Reform has been carried; but the same purpose would at least in part be answered if the legal profession were enabled to send three Members to Parliament, as their choice would naturally fall on the persons marked out by the professional distinction they had attained as fittest to become Law Officers of the Crown. The petitioners also say—

Earl Grey

"That whatever may be the household qualification for a vote in boroughs, it is of the utmost importance to adhere to the principle that all the duties of a householder shall be first performed, and especially that all rates and taxes shall be paid in full ; and that whereas certain Acts have of late years transferred the payments of rates to the landlord and allowed a composition to be made, it is essential to provide that no tenant who avails himself of such relief shall have a vote. That if any claim to be registered is allowed to the occupiers of houses on which a composition may be paid, that claim should be supported by giving up the relief of the composition and paying the full rate, and this not only on the principle that taxation should go with representation, but also because the permission to make such claims without regard to the amount of the rate paid, is really a permission to political partisans to increase at their own pleasure the list of electors."

On this point I think there can be no doubt that the opinion of the petitioners is right. I would remind your Lordships that, in the year 1859, you appointed a Select Committee to inquire what had been the effect, in municipal elections, of a clause in an Act passed a few years earlier, by which persons occupying houses on which the rates had been compounded for by their landlords were enabled to claim to be placed on the register both of Parliamentary and municipal electors. The limitation of the Parliamentary franchise to the occupiers of houses of £10 value has prevented this enactment from producing much effect in Parliamentary Elections ; but I speak in the presence of some noble Lords who served with me in the Committee, and I have no doubt they will agree with me that the evidence laid before us was conclusive as to the evils that had arisen from the change of the law to which I have adverted, and that we had proof of its having encouraged bribery and treating, and caused a great deterioration in the character of the municipal government in these boroughs in which the " Small Tenements Act," as it is called, has been brought into operation by the parochial authorities. The evidence to this effect was so clear that the Committee unanimously agreed to a Report, recommending the repeal of the clause in question.

The petitioners also state that they have seen with regret proposals to confer votes in respect of qualifications they regard as shifting, and worthless for political purposes. They think that the " Lodger Franchise," the " Savings Bank Franchise," and the " Funded Property Franchise," would be liable to constant abuse ; but they do not consider the same objection to apply to the enfranchisement of every person paying income tax, because the tax Returns would supply the register as impartially as the rate book. They further state that to confer the franchise on persons holding academic degrees, or educational certificates, would be a small matter, but they would approve of it as consistent with the principle which originally gave a vote to the Universities. This is as the petitioners say a small matter, but I confess I cannot agree with them upon it. I do not believe that any educational franchise could be contrived to confer the right of voting in local elections without being unequal and liable to abuse, while the object such a provision would have in view would be more effectually and more safely accomplished by creating special constituencies of the kind I have already described. The petitioners next proceed to state, that the true theory of representation requires that the minority as well as the majority should be fairly represented. That in former times when there were great peculiarities in different places, and much difference in the opinions prevailing in them, the representation of the minority was roughly and partially accomplished ; but that in the present state of society, when the whole country is more immediately swayed by one idea, some additional provision is necessary, and to provide that each elector may give as many votes as there are Members to be chosen, and distribute them to one or more candidates at his pleasure, appears to be the safest and easiest mode of providing for the representation of minorities. They remark that the objections to this plan have scarcely any weight as regards constituencies by which three or more representatives are chosen, and in such cases, if in no others, they pray the House to insist on so just and useful a provision. Even where two Members are to be elected they show by figures—with which I forbear from troubling your Lordships—the injustice would be incomparably less than at present.

On this point I think the argument might have been pushed further than it has been by the petitioners. I am prepared to maintain that by the plan they recommend no injustice whatever would be done, since nothing can be fairer than that if a man is allowed a certain number of votes he should be allowed to dispose of them as he pleases ; and, on the other hand, by the existing system great injustice is very often done. I refer to that very common case, which those of your Lordships who have had any experience of contested elections must often have witnessed, in which a single candidate on one side stands against two who have coalesced on the other. In such cases the only chance which the single candidate has of success is in inducing his friends and supporters to give him what are called "plumpers," that is, to throw away one-half of their votes. Thus, by what seems to me an arbitrary provision of the law, the electors of the weaker party are prevented from giving more than one vote each, while those of the stronger can give two. I am sure that those who, like myself, have had experience of contested elections under such circumstances, will bear me out in saying that this system is altogether repugnant to the feelings of ordinary electors—so much so, that it is often found necessary to put up a second candidate on the weaker side, merely to take off the votes which electors do not like to waste. But this only increases in another way the disadvantage of the weaker party. The effect, therefore, of the present system is to commit this injustice, that while it gives two votes to every elector on one side, it practically allows only one to those on the other. The system of voting recommended by the petitioners, and which is commonly known by the name of "cumulative voting," would further have the great advantage of affording the only solution yet suggested of the problem, as to how additional weight in elections may be given to the working class, by an extension of the franchise, without giving them a complete predominance. This class is so much more numerous than any others, the circumstances of those belonging to it are in general so nearly alike, and they inhabit so much the same sort of houses, that it is hardly possible to discover any qualification for voting based upon the description of house they occupy, which shall admit any considerable number of working men, without admitting so many as altogether to overpower the existing constituency. This has throughout been felt to be one of the main difficulties of arranging the franchise; and what is called "plural voting" is one of the methods proposed for escaping from it. By "plural voting," I understand a system of voting which, adopting the principle partially in use in elections under the Poor Law, would give one or more additional votes to electors occupying houses exceeding a certain value, or having more than one qualification. To such a proposal there are two strong objections. In the first place, it is invidious, it gives an advantage to mere wealth in a peculiarly offensive form; and secondly, it is calculated to do either too much or too little. If it should give so much weight to the wealthier classes as to secure them a majority, it would be open to the reproach of withdrawing with one hand from the working men the power it professes to give them with the other. If, on the other hand, it should fail to do this, it would be of no value as a security. Now, the other system, the "cumulative vote," is free from both these objections. It is in no degree invidious, since it gives precisely the same power of using his votes as he pleases to the poorest elector as to the richest, while it effectually solves the problem of giving to the working classes substantial weight, but not absolute predominance, and completely insures you against giving a monopoly of power to any one class in a constituency. And, looking forward to what is likely to be the state of things in future years, I regard this as a matter of great importance; because I think no man can carefully watch the signs of the times without perceiving it to be highly probable that with the enlarged constituencies, borough elections at least will often turn less on questions of general policy than on those by which the interests of the employers on the one side, and of the employed on the other, are supposed to be affected. Though these interests are never, I am convinced, really opposed to each other in the long run, they are often believed to be so, and we must expect severe contests to arise with reference to measures supposed to be favourable to the one side or to the other. If so, it would be most undesirable that a state of things should exist in which either the employers or the employed would obtain a monopoly of the representation. Both parties in such circumstances ought to have the means of making their views and opinions fairly heard in the House of Commons, and the mode of voting, recommended by the petitioners, would afford the surest, if not the only means by which this object could be obtained. But I know it has been objected that in the great majority of counties and boroughs returning two Members to Parliament, the Liberal and Conservative parties are so nearly balanced that, under the proposed system, each side would return one of the Members, who would thus in a party division neutralize each other, and the result would be that the control of Parliament, and the real predominance of power, would be left in the hands of the constituencies returning single Members or three. This argument rests altogether upon what is, I think, the unfounded assumption that the whole country is divided into two great parties, calling themselves Liberals and Conservatives, and that these parties are far better disciplined than is really the case. I am persuaded that while the names of Conservative and Liberal will, no doubt, continue to be freely used, the Members chosen under the proposed system would owe their seats far more to opinions prevailing upon local matters, and to the respect and popularity they may enjoy, than to their bearing the name of one or other of two parties, between which the line drawn by a real difference of opinion on great public questions is daily becoming more faint. And in future we may expect that though Members may still be called Liberals and Conservatives, their conduct in Parliament will be guided less by these names than by the judgment they may form on the questions that arise, and what they may believe to be the prevailing opinion of the public with regard to them. In support of this view of the subject, let me refer your Lordships to the history of the last Session. I would remind you that when the new Parliament assembled, according to the calculations of those useful functionaries of both parties who make such calculations, the late Government were supposed to have a clear majority of from 70 to 80. And no doubt this was true; but how rapidly this large majority melted away when the measures of the Government failed to command the approval of the House or of the public. There is another consideration which, in my judgment, is of great weight in favour of this system of voting; I mean its tendency to check the ruinous expense of elections and corruption. We must all, I am sure, feel that the enormous cost of contested elections, and the increasing prevalence of corruption, are alarming and growing evils; and it is obvious that this mode of voting would greatly reduce the amount of money now so lavishly and mischievously spent in a General Election, by diminishing the number of contests. I am quite aware that this would be looked upon as anything but an advantage by certain persons who exercise great power in elections, and to whom even an increase of the expense of contested elections would be far from disagreeable; but to the public the advantage would be clear. But what is of still more importance is, that this system is the only measure I have yet heard proposed which affords any fair prospect of checking corruption. I, for one, am very incredulous as to the probable success of attempts to stop bribery by penal legislation. So long as the corrupt inclination to give, and to accept bribes, continues to exist, little good will be done by such legislation. You may possibly suppress the modes of bribery now usually practised, but new ways of evading the law will be found out, and in some shape or other the corrupt inducement will be given to those who wish to make gain of their votes. Now, the various measures against bribery that have hitherto been tried or suggested have no tendency to diminish the inclination to take bribes; but the "cumulative vote" is calculated to do so. For, how is it that bribery is generally introduced into a borough? From the facts discovered by Election Committees, and by the Commissions which have of late years been appointed to inquire as to the existence of corrupt practices, we have learnt very clearly that such practices generally arise in this way. Two parties in a borough being nearly equal in strength, and the honest voters on the two sides almost balanced, a small number of mercenary voters, sometimes freemen, and sometimes not, find that the election is in their hands, and make it understood that they are ready to sell the power they possess. Then an unscrupulous partisan on one side or the other offers bribes to these men, and the opposite party is soon led in self-defence to do the same. Unfortunately, the bad example thus set is generally followed by others, and voters who have no strong political feeling, but were inclined honestly to give their votes in favour of the candidates they on the whole preferred, seeing their neighbours getting £15 or £20 for their votes, and apparently not the worse thought of, and knowing how great a convenience receiving such a sum would be to them, are unable to resist the temptation. And thus from a few mercenary individuals the taint spreads, till, as we learn from recent reports, whole constituencies become infected. The "cumulative vote" would stop this process, because under that system, when parties were equally balanced, instead of being led into a desperate contest by electioneering agents and others who have an interest in causing money to be spent, each party would choose a Member.

My Lords, I fear I have entered somewhat further into this question of the "cumulative vote" than I ought upon the present occasion, though I am far from having stated all the arguments in its favour. I will now revert to the petition, and there is only one further point in it to which I have to call your attention. The petitioners conclude by saying that looking to the vast importance of this question, the necessity for distinct principles as the basis of legislation, and the tentative devices that have been hitherto suggested, they fear lest great injury may be done by crude and hasty measures, and they pray the House to insist upon such a well-considered scheme as may serve to check agitation and content the people of this country, and rather even to postpone for a few months the passing of any law than to allow a partial and ill-digested measure to regulate all future elections.

Such, my Lords, is the prayer of the petition, of which I have brought under your notice the most material parts. Before I move that it be laid upon the table, I will venture to trouble you with a few remarks on the present position of the important question of Reform, for which I hope you may not consider this to be an unfitting occasion. I, for one, cannot regard the position in which this question is now placed without very serious alarm. We have reason to fear that one of two things may happen; either we may see another Session consumed in fruitless debates on this question without arriving at any practical conclusion upon it, while useful legislation is impeded; or we may do that which the petitioners deprecate—pass a crude and ill-digested measure. Either of these results would be bad; but the last is, I fear, the most probable, while it would be by far the worst. Delay and the waste of another Session would indeed be grievous evils; but they would be temporary evils, and evils we might hope to get over; the passing of an ill-considered measure would do permanent injury to the institutions of the country, and inflict upon it an evil that never could be repaired. And this appears to be what is most likely to happen. It has been announced to us that legislation on the subject of Reform is to be attempted in the present Session, while there is too much probability that from sheer disgust and weariness of the subject Parliament may consent to pass the Bill which may be submitted to us, however imperfect it may be. And from the extraordinary revelations of the last fortnight, it is plain that the measure has not been framed and matured with the deliberation and care which the difficulty and importance of the subject demand. We know what great and sudden changes there have been up to the last moment in the views of Her Majesty's Government, and within how very short a time the task of embodying these views in a Bill has been undertaken. I believe it to be impossible that a measure deserving the approval of Parliament can be produced in this manner. We have been told, indeed, that the principles of the measure were settled long ago by Her Majesty's Ministers; but I venture to remind your Lordships that this is a subject on which the principle is involved in the details. To bring forward any Reform Bill implies a proposal to extend the franchise more or less, and to take away seats from some places to confer them upon others. But the whole character of the measure depends upon the figures which determine the extent to which these changes are carried, and on the manner in which the various parts of the arrangement are adapted to each other. For instance, it is impossible to form a judgment on any proposal for the extension of the franchise till we know how the question of the redistribution of seats is to be dealt with, and what therefore will be the probable numbers and character of the constituencies the new franchise will create, and what are the conditions under which the new electors will be called upon to exercise their privilege. Without having before us a scheme of Reform as a whole, and in its details, no man can even guess how it will be likely to work. Remember, that in dealing with the question of Reform our object ought to be not merely to give satisfaction to a large number of persons who demand that a share of political power should be conceded to them. To a certain extent I admit that this is a legitimate demand, and to meet it ought to be one of the objects of a Reform Bill; but the more important object to be aimed at is to improve the character of the House of Commons, and to render it more fit to discharge its high duties in the Government of the country. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby), indeed, a few evenings ago, said that he doubted whether the result of any change we could make would be to produce a House of Commons more truly representing the feelings and opinions of the people of this country, or more judiciously, more wisely, and more impartially consulting the interests of all classes of the community. If such be the opinion of the noble Earl, I own I have some difficulty in understanding how he can have consented to attempt any alteration of the constitution of the House of Commons. For my own part, I cannot go so far as this. I think there are faults in the present constitution of the House of Commons which it would be desirable to remove; though, on the whole, since the passing of the Reform Act of 1832, it has admirably performed its functions, and satisfactorily filled its place in the Government of the country. But while I recognise the necessity of endeavouring to improve the constitution of the House of Commons, and of giving more weight in it to the working class, I am convinced that there is so much truth in the opinion of the noble Earl, that we ought on no account to consent to such an alteration, as would render the House of Commons a mere instrument for expressing the opinions, and enforcing the wishes, of the numerical majority of the population. That House ought to continue to be what it has hitherto been in theory, and to no small extent in practice, a deliberative Assembly, in which the opinions and wishes of all classes are heard, but which habitually acts under the guidance of those best able to judge what is really most for the common good. To a great extent—I am far from saying altogether—this idea has been fulfilled in practice. By means of anomalies and irregularities, in themselves open to no small objections, the important end has been attained of introducing into the House of Commons Members of various opinions indirectly representing most classes of the community, while the body as a whole has, in general, pretty correctly expressed the true opinion of the nation, meaning by the nation the majority not of mere numbers, but of those who, whether high or low, are capable of forming an independent judgment on public affairs. And guided by this opinion, it has usually caused both legislation and the Executive Government to be carried on in a manner calculated to promote the real welfare of the people. If we look back at its conduct for the last thirty-five years, such, I think, is the judgment we must form of the character and conduct of the House of Commons; and till very lately, such was the received opinion of even the most advanced Reformers.

Earl Grey

Very few years have elapsed since Mr. Bright himself endeavoured to reconcile us to the prospect of a further Reform of Parliament, by telling us how happy had been the results of the former measure. He reminded us how great had been the fears of a powerful party as to what would be the effect of the Act of 1832, and then pointed out how visionary experience had proved these fears to have been. He described in glowing words the useful and beneficent legislation which the country owed to the Reformed House of Commons, and asked how, after this experience, we could hesitate to make a further change in the constitution of that House, in the same direction with one which had proved thus successful? Up to a very recent period, that was the opinion of even such advanced Reformers as Mr. Bright. The views which Mr. Bright lately entertained—I know not whether he still adheres to them, but I hope he does—are rejected by those who have now come into the front rank of the advocates of Reform, and a totally opposite doctrine has of late become popular. We are told that a great Reform, a complete alteration of the character of the House of Commons, is necessary, because it has utterly failed in the performance of its duties; all the faults, real or imaginary, in our laws, all the evils to be found in our complicated society, are described and exaggerated—Parliament is fiercely denounced as responsible for them all, and the establishment of the unqualified supremacy of democratic power is loudly demanded as the sure and only remedy. Such is the new doctrine. Certainly, my Lords, I am not here to deny that the country is still suffering from many most serious evils, though much has been done during the last five-and-thirty years for the removal of these evils, and to increase the welfare of the people. Those who, like myself, are old enough to remember what the condition of the people really was in 1832, and who have watched the progress and effect of the various remedial measures which have one by one been since adopted, cannot doubt that in these years a great work has been accomplished. But I freely admit that while much has been done, much still remains to be done. No one can be more deeply convinced than myself of the urgent necessity for further measures for the benefit of the people. But I venture to deny that the existence of faults still remaining to be removed in our laws, and of great social evils still requiring a remedy, can be traced to the absence of sufficient popular power in Parliament, and to the want of a more democratic character in the House of Commons. If time would admit of my going into an examination of the various evils of which the continuance is imputed to the defective constitution of the House of Commons, I think I could demonstrate to your Lordships in nearly every case that there is no ground for these imputations. It is impossible for me to attempt this without making an unjustifiable demand on your patience; but I hope you will not think I am taking up too much of your time, if I ask you to permit me to examine how far, in one particular instance, it is true that evils, alleged to be owing to the insufficiency of the democratic element in the House of Commons, are really to be thus accounted for. Perhaps there is nothing for which Parliament and the Government have been so severely condemned as for the abuses which have of late been detected in the administration of the Poor Law, more especially in the metropolis. The accounts which have been given of the state of some of the London workhouses, and of the manner in which the destitute and the sick have been treated in them, have, with too much reason, created a general feeling of horror and indignation. But how have these abuses arisen? Not because the law sanctions such things as have been done. On the contrary, nothing can be clearer than that the law imposes on certain local authorities the imperative duty of providing adequate relief for the destitute and humane attendance for such of them as are sick. The provisions of the law to this effect are clear and stringent, and these abuses have only arisen because the local authorities, charged with the administration of the law, have failed in the discharge of their duty. Why have they done so? We are told it is because the Government and Parliament have neglected to exercise sufficient control over them, and this is in part, at least, the truth. But I would ask those who, like myself, sat in the House of Commons thirty years ago, and took part in discussing these matters, how did it come about that the Government and Parliament did not sooner exercise a more effective control over the local authorities? How was it that local Acts were allowed to remain in force, exempting large districts of the metropolis from the effective interference of the Poor Law Commissioners, and what is it that has mainly contributed to cripple the efforts of those Commissioners to enforce a satisfactory performance of their duties by the local authorities? Those who remember the proceedings on this subject thirty years ago, and for many subsequent years, will, I am sure, bear me out in the assertion that it was the Members of the House of Commons of the strongest democratic opinions, and amongst them especially some of the metropolitan Members, who were chiefly responsible for the vestries and Boards of Guardians not having been placed under proper control. These Members were never tired of declaiming against centralization, and the tyranny of the Commissioners in seeking to overrule the representatives of the ratepayers. I think my noble Friend the Master of the Rolls must remember those days in the House of Commons as well as myself, and the Select Committee so ably presided over by my lamented Friend Mr. Fazerley, in which it was the object of the metropolitan Members, and the Members of the Democratic party, to make out a case against the continuance of the powers of the Poor Law Commissioners. This statement will, I trust, convince your Lordships that at least so far as regards the maladministration of the Poor Law, the faults which have been committed by Parliament cannot be ascribed to the too small influence of democracy in the House of Commons. If time admitted of my going into other cases, I could, I think, show you that in most of them the same thing is true, and that the chief errors committed by the House of Commons in the last thirty-five years have arisen from its having too faithfully reflected mistaken opinions which at the time prevailed in the nation. The nation is not infallible, sometimes it is the small minority that is right, and the great majority that is wrong, and it is only slowly that on some subjects the nation comes round to sound opinions. In these cases Parliament, representing the nation, necessarily follows its opinions, and it cannot sometimes adopt reforms, and measures of improvement, which are right in themselves, because public opinion is not yet prepared for them. But the British Parliament may safely challenge a comparison with Legislatures of a more democratic character, with respect to the manner in which it has performed its duties and the wisdom of its measures.

Earl Grey

I wish I had time to compare our Parliament with the Legislatures of the Australian colonies, or with Congress and the State Legislatures of the United States, as I think I could demonstrate to you by the results, how far it is from being true that the Legislatures of the most democratic character have been the most successful in the performance of their duties. But, though I cannot now attempt this, perhaps I may venture to ask your attention to a comparison between the British Parliament and the Congress of the United States in one respect only. A distinguished Member of the other House of Parliament, and one of the most eminent modern writers on politics—I mean Mr. Stuart Mill, the Member for Westminster—has said, in his admirable work on representative government, that one of the great uses of a representative Legislature is to instruct and educate the nation, and gradually to prepare the people for the adoption of sound measures. In this respect Parliament has been eminently successful. Its debates have been the principal means by which political wisdom, and the results arrived at by the patient researches of philosophical inquirers, have been made gradually to sink into the minds of the people, and truths at first recognised only by a few of the ablest men of their day, have at length been practically adopted in legislation. Let me refer to what has happened with respect to the principles of free trade. For many years after these principles had been proclaimed by Adam Smith, they continued to be rejected, and the necessity of commercial protection to be insisted on, alike by statesmen, by landlords and farmers, by manufacturers and merchants, and especially by the working classes, who on many occasions broke out into violence in opposition to what all persons now admit to have been their own true interests. We have had in former days mobs to insist upon Parliaments excluding foreign silks, or to break frames or thrashing machines, and committing gross outrages in the hope of enforcing a mistaken policy. Even so late as when I first had the honour of a seat in the House of Commons, it was only a very small minority that ventured to declare themselves in favour of free trade. In the year 1827 I remember voting in a minority of only 12 against adopting the principle of the sliding scale in the duties on corn, which every one now admits to be a fallacy; and so strong at that time was the general feeling in favour of protection on both sides of the House, that those who denied its policy were compelled almost to apologize for the opinions they entertained, and even Mr. Huskisson himself, in recommending his wise measures for gradually breaking down the system of monopoly, was obliged to support them by arguments which I can hardly believe to have been those by which his own mind had been convinced. A total alteration of opinion has since been brought about, and the principles then generally scouted are now admitted to afford the only sound basis for legislation, and the debates in Parliament have been chiefly instrumental in producing this change. Speeches at public meetings, and the discussions of the press, great as their influence undoubtedly is, have yet less effect upon public opinion than the debates of Parliament. And it is natural that it should be so; there is no other mode by which opposite opinions can be so fairly pitted against each other, and when such men as Mr. Cobden and my right hon. Friend, the brother of the noble Earl near me (the Earl of Clarendon), one of the earliest and ablest advocates of free trade in corn, have the opportunity of exposing the fallacies brought forward against sound principles, errors are gradually broken down by the power of truth, and what was originally a minority becomes at length a majority. Now, by universal acknowledgment Congress is immeasurably inferior to the British Parliament in fulfilling this important object of a representative Legislature. Its debates command nothing like the same interest and attention, and exercise far less influence for good on the minds of the people. This is partly owing to the intellectual inferiority, as a body, of the House of Representatives at Washington to the House of Commons, partly also because in America the natural tendency of giving unlimited power to the numerical majority of the population is developing itself more and more. An assembly representing the numerical majority of the population is by its very nature intolerant of contradiction, and we know that a system of not only outvoting, but of silencing the minority, has been adopted in Congress by means of the "previous Question."

I have particularly called your Lordships' attention to the difference in this respect between the American Congress and the British Parliament, because it appears to me that nothing can afford so strong a proof of the importance of not making such a change in the mode of electing the House of Commons, as to deprive superior education and intelligence of their just influence. And I think this deserves to be the more considered, because very opposite views have lately been put forward. We are now told that political knowledge is unnecessary for the people, that it may be required in Legislators and Governors, but is not wanted in those by whom Legislators are to be chosen. The people, it is said, may be incapable of judging how the evils from which they may suffer can be cured; but they alone feel these evils so acutely as to be determined to insist on their being removed, and when this determination, backed by power, exists, they will find men capable of accomplishing the work to be done. Experience affords little ground for such an expectation. The people suffered great oppression in the reign of Henry VI, they were acutely sensible of the evils they endured, but it may well be doubted whether a real improvement in their condition would have been accomplished if they could have succeeded in raising Jack Cade to power, when he led them into rebellion by promising that seven halfpenny loaves should be sold for a penny, and that the three-hooped pot should have ten hoops. In the same manner you may remember that twenty-five years ago the great mass of the people were more inclined to trust Mr. Fergus O'Connor than Mr. Cobden, as the person who was to deliver them from the severe distress they at that time endured. Mr. Cobden told them that to relieve industry from artificial restrictions, and especially to get rid of the Corn Laws, would be the surest mode of giving relief to the suffering working classes. Mr. Fergus O'Connor told them that these measures would do little for them, and were really wanted only to increase the gain of their masters, with the risk of sacrificing the British to the foreign labourer, and that what they ought to ask for was the five points of the Charter. At out-of-doors meetings it was generally the views of Mr. Fergus O'Connor, not those of Mr. Cobden, which were popular; and in like manner in the present day, I fear it would be found that the most ignorant classes, if they should be enabled to determine to what hands power is to be trusted, would be too likely to confer it upon men little able to deal with those difficult questions of law and policy, from the right solution of which any real improvement in the condition of the people can alone be looked for.

Earl Grey

The conclusion I would draw from these considerations is, not that you ought to refuse increased representation to the working classes, but that when you admit a larger proportion of them to the franchise you are bound by ordinary prudence, and by a regard for the interest of these classes themselves, to take care that such other amendments shall at the same time be introduced into our system of representation as may be necessary to prevent its balance from being overthrown. How this ought to be done, whether by adopting the suggestions of the petitioners, or by what other means, is a question into which it would not become me to enter further at present; but I must repeat that to make a large alteration of the franchise, unaccompanied by some measure or other calculated to maintain the balance of the Constitution, would be a most dangerous course. It was on this ground that I disapproved of the Bill brought in last Session by the late Ministry. I did not think the mode of extending the franchise they proposed the best or wisest that might have been suggested; still, I should have been prepared to accept it (as it was not to its extent I objected), if it had been accompanied by other arrangements I considered indispensable. It was because it was not joined with any provisions of this kind, while we were expressly told it was to be a beginning of further alterations, that I so heartily joined in the almost universal condemnation of the first, or the "single barrelled," Bill, as it was called. Unfortunately the additions afterwards made to this Bill by the Government, in deference to the general wish for a complete measure, were so hurriedly decided upon, that they proved, as might have been expected, unsatisfactory. Still, I regretted the mode of opposition to this Bill which was adopted, and thought then, as I think still more now, that it would have been far wiser for men of moderate opinions to propose a distinct scheme for the amendment of the Bill, than to thwart and obstruct it. Another Bill is now about to be submitted to Parliament: for the reasons I have already stated, I fear that it can hardly prove to be one deserving the approval of Parliament; if not, I must express my earnest hope that Parliament may be induced to declare that it will neither allow another Session to be wasted in fruitless debates, while all the other useful legislation which is so urgently wanted is impeded, nor yet consent to pass a crude and ill-digested measure. I would venture to suggest that as the best mode of escaping from one or other of these great evils, the Bill, if it turns out as I apprehend a bad one, ought to be returned to Her Majesty's Government (whether it be the present or any other Government), in order that it may be more maturely considered, and then Parliament might again be called together in November for the express and single purpose of dealing with this very difficult question.

I have but one more word to add. I feel that an apology is due from me to your Lordships for having taken upon myself to bring this subject under your notice, at this time, in the manner I have done. The only excuse I can offer for having assumed so great a responsibility, though I am well aware I have no claim to authority or influence in the House, is, that I think the situation of affairs, with reference to this question, is as full of danger as I am sure it is unexampled. By an extraordinary combination of circumstances, and owing to what I believe to have been great faults on all sides, we are rapidly drifting towards what, in my judgment, would be the greatest evil that can befall the nation. A combined and earnest effort on the part of independent men may possibly still check the fatal progress; and, feeble as my voice may be, ineffectual as I know the attempt will in all probability prove, I have thought it my duty, not in such circumstances to be silent, but to endeavour to the best of my power to warn your Lordships of the perils before us. I move that this Petition do lie on the table.

Petition ordered to lie upon the Table.

TRAFFIC REGULATION (METROPOLIS)

BILL—(No. 35.)

(The Earl of Belmore.)

COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee on the said Bill read.

THE EARL OF BELMORE, in moving that the House go into Committee on this Bill, said, it was proposed by the Select Committee that several modifications should be introduced into it. With respect to the coal trade, the discharge of casks down cellars, and the timber trade, it was intended that the stringent rules contained in the 6th and 9th clauses, and which applied to the whole metropolis, should be relaxed, and that the restrictions should be limited to the principal thoroughfares, the great object being to keep open the leading routes. It was proposed that the regulations prohibiting the loading and unloading of goods in certain streets should be abandoned, otherwise the total destruction of warehousing in those streets would be the result. The limitations in this respect would now apply only to the through traffic. With respect to hackney carriages, it was originally intended that there should be no fare less than 1s. The cab-owners, however, having considered this matter, had come to the conclusion that it would be injurious to them, because they would be deprived of a great number of 6d. fares which they got under the present arrangement. The original proposal was therefore abandoned. With regard to the introduction of a better class of hackney carriages, it was proposed that where a proprietor of carriages was desirous of letting them at higher fares he might make application to the Commissioner of Police, who, upon inspection of the vehicle, might grant a licence to ply at a higher rate of charge, the licence stating that higher amount. It was also provided that the carriage should be taken for inspection to the Commissioner of Police or some person appointed by him at least once every two months. Some slight modifications had also been made with respect to the removal of snow, and regulations were laid down for the protection of shoeblacks and commissionaires, to prevent the work being carried on by unauthorized persons.

Moved, "That the House do resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill."
—(The Earl of Belmore.)

LORD REDESDALE thought that there should be some relaxation respecting hours between summer and winter. It had been represented that in winter the time was too limited for the removal of furniture and many of the operations of the building trade.

Motion agreed to: House in Committee..

Clauses 1 to 10 amended and agreed to.

Clause 11 (Prohibition of Carriage of Advertisements).

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY desired to say a word on behalf of a very deserving class of poor men who were ordinarily called "sandwiches." He had a great deal of communication with these men, and he knew them to be very deserving. Most of them were aged, those who were young were generally cripples, and if they were put out of employment by the operation of the Bill, they would be reduced to absolute starvation. A few years ago they were put down by the police, and when he spoke to Sir Richard Mayne in their behalf, Sir Richard said that they were a quiet body of men, but that the shopkeepers objected that they obstructed doorways and shut out customers. He did not think this objection on the part of the large shopkeepers ought to be allowed to deprive these poor people of a livelihood. He thought that if the word "board" were struck out of the clause the object would be attained.

LORD HOUGHTON said, he gladly supported the suggestion of the noble Earl. It had been given in evidence before the Committee that these were a most inoffensive body of men, and if the clause were to pass unaltered about 700 people would be thrown out of employment. He was a great peripatetic, he went about London a good deal, and he had never found any inconvenience from these men whatever. To say that they were more in the way than other people walking about was absurd.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that for the sake of finding employment for a few infirm old men, the "sandwich nuisance" ought not to be allowed to continue. Very often these men carrying about placards on the pavement frightened horses, and prevented carriages driving up to shop doors. If they were to make an attempt to clear the streets of obstructions, he hoped that no alteration would be made in the Bill.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, that at present these men could be dealt with by the police under the Metropolitan Act.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, he had never heard sandwich men called nuisances before. He challenged proof of an instance in which they had frightened a horse. They were only objectionable to shopkeepers with large windows. These men were generally infirm, and resorted to this employment as the last means of gaining a subsistence. Their Lordships would do a kind act if they struck out the word which included them.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY deemed the sandwich men a nuisance because they walked in the gutters and presented a formidable array to be encountered by a carriage driving up to a shop door.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR suggested

The Earl of Shaftesbury

that it might be possible to limit the height of the boards which the men carried.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, the object of the clause was a good one, being to keep the streets clear of obstructions; and if these men obstructed the clear passage of the streets they ought to be stopped. He thought they would find other employment.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY rebutted from his own knowledge the allegation that these men could easily find other employment, and said that the result of the passing of the clause would be a most serious injury to them.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 12 to 18, inclusive, agreed to.

Clause 19 (Carriage to be subject to provisions of Hackney Carriage Acts, with additions.)

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH said, that 4,190 persons had been killed or injured in the streets of London between 1858 and 1865; and therefore he was justified in concluding that there was not proper control of the traffic; and he attributed the accidents to the furious driving of light carts, which were often in charge of youths who thought it good fun to drive recklessly. He proposed, therefore, to introduce a clause to check the evil—

"And be it enacted, That it shall be incumbent upon the Owner of any Cart or Vehicle plying in the Streets in the Butchers Trade or Costermongers Trade, or any other small retail Traffic, to have a Tail Board attached thereto, and to have inscribed thereon a Number the Figures of which shall not be less on each Figure than Two Inches in Length, and that Number as a Designation of such Vehicle shall be registered in the Office where other Hackney Carriages are registered, and that any Prosecutor against the Offence of reckless driving shall be entitled to refer to that Number as a sufficient Identification of the Vehicle and its Owner; and that if any such Vehicle shall be found plying in any Street without such Number thereon, the Owner or the Driver thereof shall be subject, on Conviction, to be imprisoned for One Month."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the object of his noble Friend was a good one; but he was afraid that it would not be attained by the insertion of the proposed clause. In the first place, it would only affect the carts of butchers, costermongers, and others engaged in small retail traffic. It was obvious, however, that the magistrates would find it difficult to define what a small retail traffic was. Moreover, the clauses under discussion related to vehicles plying for hire in the streets. Then his noble Friend proposed to impose a tax on such carts, but he doubted whether a clause relating to taxation could be introduced in that House. It was also suggested that the carts should be of a peculiar construction, and that the tail-boards should be numbered so conspicuously that even weak sighted persons might read the figures. No provision was made, however, that the tail-boards should be kept up. Under all the circumstances, he must object to the insertion of the clause.

Clause withdrawn.

Clauses 20 and 21 agreed to.

Clause 22 (Licensing Shoe-blacks and Commissionaires.)

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY said, this clause affected the Shoe-black Brigade which would be to some extent placed under the control of the Commissioners of Police. He might mention that none of the lads occupied the best stations for more than a fortnight, or at most three weeks at a time. If all the arrangements, however, were left to the police, he feared that the whole system of the society would fall to the ground.

THE EARL OF BELMORE said, it was understood that the societies would always be consulted before any new regulations were made. The object of the clause was to prevent unauthorized persons from interfering with the regular shoe-blacks.

Clause agreed to.

Remaining clauses and schedules agreed to.

The Report of the Amendments to be received on Tuesday next, and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 46.)

House adjourned at half past
Seven o'clock, to Monday next, Eleven o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, March 15, 1867.

MINUTES.]—New Warr Issued—For Huntingdon County, v. The Hon. Robert Montagu, commonly called Lord Robert Montagu, Vice President of the Committee of Council for Education.

NEW MEMBERS SWORN—Viscount Newport, for Salop (Northern Division); Right Hon. Sir John Somerset Pakington, baronet, for Droitwich.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee—ARMY ESTIMATES.—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES (on Account.)

PUBLIC BILLS—Ordered—Mutiny.*

First Reading—Masters and Workmen * [77];

Public Schools * [78]; Mutiny.*

Second Reading—Charitable Donations and Bequests (Ireland) [49]; Chester Courts * [69].

Third Reading—Dublin University Professorships * [59], and passed.

MR. CHURCHWARD'S APPOINTMENT.

QUESTION.

MR. TAYLOR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the Mr. Churchward who has lately been nominated to the Magistracy at Dover is the same gentleman of whom a Committee of this House remarked, in their Report in 1859, that he had—

"Resorted to corrupt expedients affecting injuriously the character of the representation of the people in Parliament," and of whom likewise it was reported by a Select Committee of this House, in 1853, that he had been guilty of bribery.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, since the hon. Member placed his Notice on the Paper I have communicated with my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor, and I have also referred to the Report to which, I suppose, the question of the hon. Member alludes, imputing bribery to Mr. Churchward.* I will read the exact words of that Report, which are contained in two distinct paragraphs, and I think the House will see that it is really not a fair thing to say that Mr. Churchward was charged with bribery in the sense which the question implies. The first charge relates to the election at Plymouth in 1853. The Report says—

"That it was proved that George Knapman was bribed by C. J. Marc, Esq., and by Joseph George Churchward by the promise to use their influence to obtain a situation in the Excise."

That is the first Report, and the House will see that the case was one of promising to procure a place, and not one of bribery by giving money. I hope hon. Gentlemen will see that there was a very material distinction between the two things in the view of the Committee, whose opinion has never been challenged by the House. The Committee make this further Report—

"That a general belief appears to have prevailed at Plymouth both previous to and at the election in 1853 that it was not illegal for a candidate or his agents to obtain, or promise to obtain, situations or employment for electors who had previously pledged their votes."

The Committee add—

"That the circumstances of the case are not such as to induce the Committee to recommend a further inquiry by Commission."

These being the facts of the case, I will communicate to the House the answer which my noble Friend the Lord Chancellor has given relative to his appointment of Mr. Churchward as a magistrate—

"Mr. Churchward was a stranger to me. In the application for new magistrates for Dover he was recommended by gentlemen upon whom I felt myself justified in relying, and I was utterly ignorant until I was shown the Notice of the Question that he had ever been suspected of being concerned in any irregular transactions connected with elections."

That is the answer of my noble Friend.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE: I wish to ask whether the noble Lord, now that the facts have come to his knowledge, has rescinded the appointment?

MR. WALPOLE: The hon. and learned Gentleman, if he asks such a question, ought to give me notice.

MR. SERJEANT GASELEE: Then I beg to give notice that I shall ask the question on Monday next.

MR. TAYLOR said, the right hon. Gentleman had not answered the part of his (Mr. Taylor's) Question which referred to whether Mr. Churchward was the same gentleman of whom a Committee of that House, in their Report in 1859, remarked that he had—

"Resorted to corrupt expedients affecting injuriously the character of the representation of the people in Parliament?"

MR. WALPOLE: I thought I had answered that question. Mr. Churchward is the same gentleman to whom both branches of the hon. Member's inquiry refers.

IRELAND—SALMON FISHERIES.

QUESTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he rose to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce, during the present Session, a Bill similar to that promised by the late Administration, to amend the Laws relating to the Salmon Fisheries of Ireland?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MORRIS) said, in reply, that he was not aware that any Bill was promised by the late Government; but if the hon. Gentleman would call upon him and state what he wanted, he (Mr. Morris) would consider the subject, and offer the best advice in his power to the Government.

Mr. Walpole

METROPOLIS—HYDE PARK.

QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN LUSK said, he wished to ask, the First Commissioner of Works, If he thinks it desirable to continue the elaborate horticultural embellishment of the Park Lane side of Hyde Park, at considerable public expense, while the Bayswater side and Kensington Gardens are in the same respect comparatively neglected?

MR. DYCE NICOL said, he also wished to ask, whether the unsightly fence surrounding the Park should not be removed; whether the contractor could not be induced to complete the new railings before July, 1868; and whether it was true that the price of those railings was to be £40,000?

LORD JOHN MANNERS: Assuming, Sir, as I cannot do, that the adjectives and adverbs of the worthy Alderman's Question are correct, I can only answer it in the affirmative. With respect to the Question of the hon. Member for Kincardineshire (Mr. Dyce Nicol) no doubt the contractor might be induced to hurry on the work, if the public are prepared to pay him more money for so doing. But, considering how and by whom the railings were destroyed, I am not prepared to recommend the House of Commons to make any additional outlay. As to the latter portion of the hon. Gentleman's Question, it is one of the most incorrect statements I have ever known placed on the notice paper of the House.

MILLWALL IRONWORKS COMPANY.

QUESTION.

MR. WEGUELIN said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, Whether the Government has entered into a Contract with the Millwall Ironworks Company (Limited) for the manufacture of a considerable quantity of Gun Iron; whether there was any reason for the Government in this case differing from the usual practice of putting such Contracts up to public competition, and whether it was done in pursuance of a suggestion made by a Mr. Hughes, said to be Manager of that Company, on the occasion of a deputation waiting on Earl Derby to represent the state of distress in East London; and, if so, whether the Government are aware that an equal amount of distress exists among the Ironworkers in other districts; whether he will consent to lay a Copy of the Contract in question upon the table of the House, and will state whether he has satisfied himself as to the capability of the said Company to execute it; and whether he is aware that the representation of Mr. Hughes that the Company would at once take on 1,000 workmen was unauthorized and exaggerated?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, the hon. Gentleman is, of course, aware that this transaction took place before I assumed my present office; but I have reason to believe that it arose partly in consequence of a communication made from the Treasury to the War Office, and partly from the desire to find some employment, if it could properly be done, to persons suffering from distress in the East of London. My answer to the first part of the question is that a contract was entered into to the extent of 1,000 tons of iron with the Millwall Company. In reply to the second question, I think that the hon. Gentleman has too much assumed that this was a departure from the usual custom with respect to putting up such contracts to public competition. The facts are, that the War Office called upon several selected companies for a supply of iron, the object being to obtain the superior class of iron necessary for making guns. The Millwall Company sent in the lowest tender. It was accepted, and they were employed. They performed their contract well, and this order for 1,000 tons of iron was, in fact, only a renewal and continuance of a pre-existing contract between these parties. I have no objection to lay a copy of the contract on the table. With respect to the last question, I believe the hon. Gentleman has been misled as to the number of persons that it was said would be employed if the order were given. I am informed that Mr. Hughes never held out any such expectations, and that his statement was that the order would bring such a number of workmen into employment as would relieve the parish of the maintenance of 1,000 persons, including their families. The difference between 1,000 workmen and 1,000 persons, including the families of the workmen, is a very material one.

MR. WEGUELIN said, he wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman was satisfied that the Millwall Ironworks Company were in a position to execute the contract?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: That subject has been considered. The company have been carrying out the contract up to this time in a manner perfectly satisfactory to the War Office, and the result of inquiries on the spot is that we have no reason to doubt their competency.

MR. GLADSTONE: The right hon. Gentleman has been understood to say that the Treasury made the recommendation to the War Office that there should be an expenditure of public money with a view to relieve the distress in the East of London. I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman has been correctly understood; and, if so, whether he will lay the correspondence on the table?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: As I have already stated, whatever took place on this matter occurred before I came into my present office. I have reason to believe that very strong representations were made to the Government as to the great distress prevailing at the East End of London. Inquiries were made during the time I held the office of First Lord of the Admiralty as to whether iron ships could not be ordered with a view to relieve that distress. I believe that no direct recommendation was made, but that a suggestion came from the Treasury whether it would be consistent with the practice of the War Office to give an extended order to the Millwall Ironworks Company?

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

LIFE SENTENCES.—QUESTION.

MR. HIBBERT rose to call attention to the present mode of carrying out life sentences, and to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, having in view the immediate discontinuance of transportation to Western Australia, and the proposal to substitute in many cases sentence of penal servitude for life for the punishment of death, he intends to make any better provision for the effectual treatment of such sentences. He believed that great progress had been made of late years in regard to penal legislation, and the treatment of criminals in prisons, and there had been a great tendency in their legislation to do away with capital punishment and add to the number of life sentences. When it was remembered that those sentences were applicable to the most hardened class of our offenders—to those who had their capital sentences commuted to penal servitude for life, and who had committed the most violent offences, such as burglary and the like, the House, he thought, would agree with him that those sentences ought to be carried out in a manner which was properly deterrent, and that those on whom they were passed ought not too easily or too soon to be thrown back into society. According to the rules laid down by the Directors of Convict Prisons, a different rule applied to those prisoners who were sentenced to penal servitude for life before the 12th of July, 1864, and those who had received such sentences after that date. The rule as to the first-class was this—

“Convicts under sentence of penal servitude for life received on public works prior to the 12th of July, 1864, to be brought forward when they have served twelve years from date of conviction; but it is clearly and distinctly to be understood that, although no recommendation for release is to be made until after twelve years, no right of release at that period is to be conceded, nor is the expectation to be held out that it will be granted.”

The rule with regard to those convicts who had received life sentences since the 12th of July, 1864, was that no expectation of release from prison after a certain number of years should be held out to them, and that every case must be taken on its own merits. The rules of the system, however, were not observed in practice. According to the evidence of Colonel Henderson, the chairman of the Directors of Convict Prisons, every prisoner expected a remission of his sentence at the end of about twelve years. If the fact were so, it was quite time to consider whether that was a proper mode of dealing with sentences of that nature. Colonel Henderson was asked by the Capital Punishment Commission in 1864 whether they had then in their convict prisons in England a considerable number of persons under sentences of penal servitude for life. He answered “Yes:” and when further questioned whether all these persons had not hopes that, after some time, by their good conduct and industry, they would get out of prison, his reply was again in the affirmative; and he added that he believed it would take a century to prove to the criminal class that they were in earnest and that they would be kept locked up; not one of them would believe it. Colonel Henderson went on to say—

Mr. Hibbert

“All those men now under sentence of penal servitude for life are told that they can expect no remission whatever; but they do not believe it; they know perfectly well that ten or twelve, or fourteen or fifteen years hence their cases will be brought forward, and that the crime will be almost forgotten; they are quite sure that something will happen, and that they will be released.”

Captain Cartwright, Governor of Gloucester Prison, was asked—

“Do you think that any of the convicts believe in the existence of such a thing as perpetual imprisonment under the present system?—No, they do not. They are perfectly aware that it will not be perpetual?—They are perfectly aware of it.”

Similar testimony was borne by the Governor of the Portland Convict Prison. It was not the custom to retain these prisoners in confinement beyond twelve, fourteen, or fifteen years, even though they had been sentenced to penal servitude for the whole of their lives. All these convicts were placed under the separate system for nine months at one or other of the separate system prisons. They were then carried forward to the public works at Chatham, Portland, or some other public works prison. The whole system of public works prisons was based on the convict gaining his liberty at some future time by good conduct and industry. Therefore, if prisoners under these sentences were to be detained for life, it was impossible that they could be kept in the convict prisons and put upon public works, where the prisoners obtained their release after a certain period by their good conduct and industry. The system of our convict prisons was not intended, at the time it was established, for sentences of this kind. It was originally intended entirely for dealing with sentences of ten, twelve, fifteen, or twenty years, which were to be carried out on public works, with the chance of a remission of the term on account of industry and good conduct. Formerly we sent away criminals to the Australian or other colonies; but that system had ceased. Western Australia declined to receive any more convicts from this country, and for the future we must provide for their retention in this country. Sir Walter Crofton, a very able man, in the evidence which he gave before the Capital Punishment Commission) said—

“3,554. The convict system in England, as established by Sir Joshua Jebb, was meant for an intermediate system?—It never contemplated keeping these men for life. Practically; if you have this class mixed up with others, they will be so accustomed to see stimulants to good conduct given in the way of tickets-of-leave, and other inducements, that they, not having anything of the sort, would be likely to be very troublesome; whereas, if they were in a special prison by themselves, where they would not be surrounded by those kinds of stimulants, they would be content with any slight improvement in position; you can preserve hope among prisoners by taking them from very hard and distasteful labour and placing them gradually to industrial employment."

Again, when asked—

"3,549. What do you suggest is the proper place? He said, I should keep them in prisons by themselves. I am firmly convinced, from my own personal experience, that almost all serious and successful assaults upon prison officers arise from negligence or carelessness on their own part, or from the want of what has been termed 'individualization,' or study of the individual character of the prisoners; so that many of them are placed in situations and at work from which they should have been carefully excluded. The danger of successful murderous assaults on officers will be found absolutely nothing under a judicious management."

But two distinct objections were advanced against the detention of persons in prison for life. It was said that it would be hard to confine a man without holding out to him some hope of a remission of his sentence or some hope of some kind, because perpetual confinement with no other prospect before him would be dangerous to both his mental and physical health. In answer to that argument, he (Mr. Hibbert) might state, on the experience we had gained from our convict prison at Broadmoor, that there were on an average 100 prisoners kept in confinement at Broadmoor for nearly the whole of their lives without any such evil results being in their case produced. Another argument used against life confinements was this, it was contended that the safety of the warders would be endangered if they had to deal with prisoners sentenced to confinement for the whole of their lives. This argument was equally unsupported by experience. The number of the attacks made on the warders at Broadmoor did not, he believed, exceed those which were made on the officers of other prisons. He might add that in those instances in which such attacks were made his opinion was that they resulted from a neglect of the proper principles of treatment. A very able man, Captain Knight, formerly director of the Portland Prison, said he was perfectly convinced, after a long experience in such matters, that almost all the serious assaults which were made on the officers of prisons were in great measure due to their own carelessness, or from the want of what was termed "individualization." It was also shown by very important information which had been furnished by Sir Walter Crofton with respect to the prisons in Belgium and Baden, that the prisoners under life sentences there underwent long periods of solitary confinement, if judiciously treated, with little or no mental or bodily deterioration. The information which was furnished by Captain Knight with respect to the prisons of Louvaine, Ghent, and Namur, was still more important. Several prisoners were reported as having been subjected in those prisons to confinement for periods ranging from ten to twenty-five years, and one thirty-three years, without having their physical or mental health in any way injured. At Baden prisoners for life passed the first six years in solitary confinement, and that treatment was continued after that period if a prisoner wished it. At present there were six prisoners there under life sentences who were kept in solitary confinement, one of whom had been under that treatment for fifteen years, another for nine years, but their mental and bodily health had not suffered. Twelve other convicts had been in prison from twelve to fifteen years—they enjoyed good health mentally and bodily and were by no means depressed. Colonel Henderson said he might add that prisoners without the hope of liberty could only be confined in ordinary convict prisons by treating them as wild beasts in the Zoological Gardens. But, when asked if they could be kept in a prison apart from other convicts, under a separate provision, he stated that that could be done. The question which he had brought under the notice of the House was all the more important that the system of transportation was being done away with. He found that during the last six years 98 life sentences had been passed in this country, while 62 capital sentences had been commuted into life sentences, making altogether 160 which came under the latter head. Now, it was no easy matter to deal with so large a number of prisoners of that class. In 1856 no less than 31 convicts under life sentences were sent to West Australia, there being already there 83, so that there were thus 114 of those prisoners taken off our hands. Colonel Henderson, indeed, said in his Report for 1865 that there were only 81 life-sentenced convicts in the English prisons, 51 of whom were invalids. It was difficult to get at the exact number, but let him suppose there were only 81—it might very fairly be assumed that the state of things would be very different for the future. Owing, as he had said before, to the abandonment of transportation to West Australia we would have to deal with an increasing number of those convicts at home, while the tendency to do away with capital punishment, except in extreme cases, would also operate in the same direction. Under those circumstances, he felt assured his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and the House would concur with him in the opinion that it was highly desirable our penal system should be established on a sound basis and on large and intelligible principles. We had been going on very well of late years, building up a penal system which had obtained the approval of the French Government, whose Commissioner sent over to inquire into its working had reported favourably with regard to it. He hoped his right hon. Friend would not hesitate to do everything in his power to render it still more worthy of the country. He begged, in conclusion, to ask him, Whether, having in view the immediate discontinuance of transportation to Western Australia, and the proposal to substitute in many cases sentence of penal servitude for life for the punishment of death, he intends to make any better provision for the effectual treatment of such sentences?

Mr. GILPIN said, it was impossible to overrate the importance of this subject, which he thanked the hon. Gentleman for having brought forward. He most emphatically agreed with the hon. Gentleman that the tendency of our legislation was towards, and would very shortly culminate in, the abolition of capital punishment, though a few antediluvians still clung to the belief that it was the great protector of our lives and liberties, just as the Judges of old believed that the jibbet was necessary to prevent stealing from a dwelling-house to the value of 40s. But just as he believed that capital punishment would soon be abolished, so to the same extent did he believe in the necessity for the establishment of such a system of secondary punishment as should act as a deterrent from crime. He was not one of those who could be charged with sentimentality in advocating the abolition of capital punishment; but he desired to prevent crime, and that the Judges should really mean what they said when they sentenced criminals to longer or shorter terms of imprisonment. The object of punishment should be threefold—first, the protection and security of society; secondly, the reformation of the offender; and, in the third place, any system should be deprecated which absolutely shut out all hope from the criminal, however abandoned he might be. And when he said "hope," he did not mean the hope of freedom; there were other sources of hope for prisoners. He did not say that the prison doors should ever be opened again to the worst class of criminals; but even to them there should be offered the opportunity of getting their prison condition improved in consequence of their good conduct in prison. He trusted that our future legislation would have the tendency to make the sentences that were passed real instead of merely nominal, and that the exception and not the rule should be to make the sentence less severe than the Judge had pronounced in open court.

Mr. DENMAN said, he took a great interest in the question. At the last Social Science Congress held in Manchester in the autumn, he presided over the Jurisprudence Department of the old Law Amendment Society, which had been included within the scope of the Congress; and, on that occasion, at a meeting of one of the sections, presided over by the hon. Member for Middlesex (Mr. Hanbury), Sir Walter Crofton read a paper on this subject, which led to a very interesting and able discussion, in which a great number of those best acquainted with the subject took part. The result was that a large and very intelligent meeting came to a strong and almost unanimous resolution that the proposition now brought to the notice of the House was one that ought to be adopted as part of the law. There were, at the present moment, reasons of the greatest urgency why that should be done. One was that the old system of transportation to Western Australia was at an end; and another was, as he had heard Judges over and over again declare, that it was a great derogation to their high judicial office that they should be obliged to pass sentences of penal servitude or imprisonment for life, which they, and the jury, and the audience, and the prisoners, perfectly well knew would never be carried out. That was a mischief which tended to bring the law into contempt. The present was a fitting time to bring the question forward, because Parliament was on the verge now of considering carefully a Bill to limit the number of offences to which capital punishment should be applicable; and it was absolutely essential that the question which had been introduced that evening should also at the same time, and in view of such a change, receive consideration. If the Bill became law, a great additional number of life sentences would be passed; and it was admitted on all hands that prisoners on life sentences, if placed with other prisoners not sentenced for life, and if deprived of all hope of obtaining, as the others might, a diminution of their sentence, or of procuring better treatment for themselves, in consequence of good behaviour, would be rendered unmanageable; but, if separated from the rest, their health would not suffer, and they could be induced by the hope of improvements in their condition, short of the recovery of their liberty, to behave themselves well.

Mr. Hibbert

MR. THOMAS CHAMBERS said, he was present at the discussion in Manchester which had been referred to by his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Denman), and he listened for three or four hours until his blood ran cold at the elaborate descriptions of the system which was now proposed for adoption. The arguments in favour of the suggested change implied an absolute alteration in the present system of punishments. As long as transportation to the colonies could be continued it was known that the prisoners, if they behaved well, would obtain tickets-of-leave; and though they could not return to this country, they regained their liberty, and they or their children sometimes reached the highest positions in the colonies to which they had been sent. But since the convicts had been retained at home thousands of persons had been sentenced to penal servitude and transportation for life, but the sentence was never literally and exactly carried out, and no Judge who uttered it ever imagined that it would be. There had never been any false pretence about the matter as has been alleged, and no Judge had ever been wronged, or ever thought himself wronged, by the remission of the sentence. It might be doubted whether the public knew as well as the Judge did that the sentence would not be strictly carried out; and therefore the sentence when pronounced in court might have its full deterrent effect. But now, under the pretext of altering the administrative arrangements for carrying out the criminal law, Parliament was asked to make a substantial alteration in the system of punishment in this country. It was proposed that a man sentenced to imprisonment for life should have that sentence strictly carried out; and a man so convicted would be left without hope—except such hope as it was suggested he would get from the prospect of an alteration in the circumstances of his confinement—the lightening of his fetters or of his labours—the confinement itself, however, lasting until his death. Nothing could be more unequal or unfair than that proposal which might condemn the young prisoner to sixty or seventy years of dreary imprisonment, while the old prisoner would die in a year or two after his sentence, and so escape. The principle of the English law had hitherto been to improve a prisoner under the influence of hope; but here was a new doctrine seeking to improve him without the use of that great agent for reformation. The proposal with all its surroundings was a step back towards barbarism, and not an advance in civilization, nor was there any excuse for the change. He contended that murder was almost invariably the single crime of a life. A man who might in every respect be good and exemplary—a good husband, a good father, a good neighbour—from some motive or impulse might be hurried into committing a murder, and for that he very justly forfeited his life; now, however, the law said to its administrators that the capital sentence might safely be done away with; but was it therefore necessary that a man who had committed a murder and whose sentence was imprisonment and not death should be kept in prison forty or fifty years without being allowed even the hope of getting out? Would any man say that it was probable if he should come out of prison that he would go and commit another murder? The pickpocket who was imprisoned and then let out again might very naturally return, and very frequently did return, to his former evil courses; but the man who committed murder was not at all likely to commit another if he were liberated. There was no danger or peril to society in letting such a man out of prison after he had been confined some time; and he could not therefore see why this stringent rule of confinement for life should not be relaxed. It appeared to him that some of the arguments used in favour of this proposal were the strongest arguments against it. It was said by those who were advocating such a course that if sentence of death was commuted into penal servitude for life it would take a hundred years to make the convicts comprehend that this sentence would not be further commuted to a sentence of imprisonment for years. It was satisfactory, however, to find that there was such faith in the clemency of the Crown that the convict who deserved the clemency of the Crown would get it, and he rejoiced that to root out that conviction from the mind of the convict would be no easy matter. Those men who were sentenced to penal servitude for life were to be kept like wild beasts in a menagerie. The effect of that would be most disastrous. The prison would in that case become a hell upon earth, because the very meaning of hell was a place whence hope was excluded. All hope of release was to be taken away from the convicts, which would reduce them to a condition that could not easily be imagined. Even those who favoured such a scheme acknowledged this, for they gave colour to the belief that the warders' lives would be endangered in having to take charge of men rendered desperate by despair of release, by making certain provisions which it was hoped would secure the warders from personal violence. One great and convincing argument against such a system was that men could not live under such circumstances. Mind and body would break down under a system so remorseless as this. The experiment, it was said, had been tried on the Continent to what extent they could inflict prolonged pain without destroying life. He hoped such an objectionable experiment would not be carried out in this country. The object of punishment was to protect society against crime and its consequences; but if care were not exercised we might establish a system of punishments which would re-act most unfavourably upon the moral tone of this country. Flogging, for instance, was a punishment which he should be sorry to see permanently established as a punishment in this country, not because he sympathized with the men who were to be flogged, but because he sympathized with the warders who were to inflict it, and with the public who had to read most revolting descriptions of the punishment. Another argument against the employment of extreme punishments was that crime was not increasing in this country, and that cruel and violent crimes—such as burglary with violence, and highway robbery with violence—were rapidly diminishing. For one burglary where the parties in the house were put in terror there were twenty where it was a merely secret entry; whereas burglaries used to be committed by half-a-dozen men with crape over their faces and bludgeons in their hands, and the utmost violence was used to the parties in the house. Extreme punishments were therefore not wanted to deter from crime. The nation was advancing favourably in this respect, and unfortunate indeed would it be if they should set up an entirely novel system of punishment, excluding hope and inflicting as much pain as possible, and for as long a time as possible, only not mitigating, not moderating, but graduating it to such a nicety as just to preclude the escape of the wretched victims from their tortures by dying.

THE O'CONOR DON said, he took a great interest in this question, and desired to point out that the hon. Member's (Mr. Hibbert's) proposition went to this extent only, that remission of life sentences should be made the exception, instead of being the rule, as it was at present. He could not help thinking the great desideratum was that it should be known what would be the effect of the sentences as pronounced by the Judge, and that the public at large should know what it meant. This was not the case at present. When a man was sentenced for only a certain period people knew what his punishment would be; but when he was sentenced for life they did not know. Up to the year 1864, the rule as regarded life sentences was that during the first twelve years of his imprisonment the convict could expect no remission, but that after that time the sentence would be taken into consideration and might be commuted. The result was that men sentenced to penal servitude for life got released sooner than men who had only been sentenced for twenty years. This was a great anomaly; and the alteration proposed was not a subversion of our criminal system, but carried it out to its logical conclusion.

MR. WALPOLE: In order to discuss this question in a fair manner, I think it may be as well to pay attention to what is the present state of the law—or rather the practice—as applicable to the existing state of things, and what will be the state of the law if the alterations be made in it proposed by the measures now before Parliament. The two questions are quite distinct. With regard to the first question the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hibbert) is not quite accurate in his representation of the state of the law as regards life sentences. It is perfectly true that from the year 1857 down to the year 1864 the practice with respect to life sentences was that they should be brought forward for the consideration of the Home Secretary at the end of twelve years, although it did not necessarily follow that any immediate action should be then taken upon them. But this is not the present practice. When last year I succeeded to the office which I have now the honour to hold, I found that the right hon. Gentleman who preceded me (Sir George Grey) had had his attention drawn to the question whether twelve years was the proper period at which life sentences should be brought forward for further consideration, and that he had given a qualified approval—which met with my concurrence—to the proposition that life sentences should not be brought forward for the consideration of the Home Secretary until twenty years after they had been passed. The state of the practice under the present law is therefore much more severe than it was three years ago. The reason for this alteration is unanswerable, and has been pointed out by the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (The O'Connor Don). According to the present practice a convict who has been sentenced to twenty years is not entitled to a remission until the end of fifteen years; and a man sentenced to twenty-four years is not so entitled until the expiration of eighteen years; and it appears to me that it is most unjustifiable that a man on whom has been passed what purports to be a much heavier sentence—imprisonment for life—should have it commuted at the end of a shorter period. The Secretary of State for the Home Department has three things to look at in the remission of sentences. In the first place, they have to take into consideration the heinousness of the crime committed; and this very year I have refused to look into case after case upon the ground of the enormity of the crime committed by the convict whose case was sent up for remission. In the second place, the Home Secretary has to look at the conduct of the convict in prison; and thirdly, he has to take into consideration the health or age of the convict, or any other peculiar character the case may present which may constitute a reason for the remission of the sentence. I need scarcely point out that as under the present practice a life sentence cannot, as a matter of course, be brought up for remission until after a period of twenty years it constitutes a most terrible punishment. With reference to the number of life sentences, I may observe that there exists some misapprehension. I have been much surprised at the small number of cases in which such sentences are pronounced. Thus, in the year 1865, there were only eleven, and in the year 1866, there were only sixteen instances in which convicts were sentenced to confinement for life; while the total number of convicts in England subject to such a punishment is only eighty-one—a state of things which is very different to what is generally supposed to exist. Of these there were sixty-three, who, from age or state of health, it had not been practicable to transport. That being the state of the law as it stands at present, a very difficult question arises as to whether any and, if so, what alteration can possibly be made in the law when transportation has been discontinued, which will, in all probability, be the case at the end of the coming summer. A ship was dispatched to West Australia the other day with 250 convicts; and probably another ship, which would be the last dispatched, would carry out about 280 more. When that event takes place the question will arise as to what is to be done with our convicts who have been guilty of the graver offences. When I had to consider this question in 1852, it was then represented that it would be necessary to secure some place near the United Kingdom—Lundy Island was at one time thought of—where the worst class of convicts might be sent, and where they could be placed under a more severe discipline and punishment than those who had been convicted of lesser offences. That, however, is a matter for future consideration, although at the time it was made, I thought the suggestion was a proper one. Some such system ought, I think, to be adopted, especially with regard to convicts who, having had their life sentences remitted, have afterwards forfeited their right to be at large. I must further say a few words as to the mode in which life sentences ought to be carried out. Life sentences are now passed for the crimes of murder, attempts to murder, manslaughter, rape, arson, and one or two other offences. Persons convicted of these different crimes are, have been, and should be, dealt with in precisely the same manner. Therefore, I think, some discretion should be given to the Secretary of State as to the principle upon which these sentences, passed upon convicts whose crimes must necessarily vary somewhat in degree, should be carried out. I own I rather shrink from the notion that you are to lay down a rule by Act of Parliament which is to be inflexible under any circumstances. It must not be forgotten that if you destroy hope you destroy one of the great objects of punishment—namely, the reformation of the offender. I therefore think that no better rule can be adopted than to say that these life sentences shall not be brought up for remission until after a period of twenty years, and I would then leave the Minister who has to administer the law with reference to this subject free to exercise his discretion in the matter, to take into consideration all the circumstances of the individual case brought before him, and to decide whether the convict should remain in prison for life, or whether his sentence might be properly commuted. The conclusions I have come to upon this subject are that it is desirable, in view of the alteration in our convict system about to be introduced in consequence of the abolition of transportation, we should have some penal establishment near this country, where we can send the worst class of offenders; and secondly, that some discretion should be left to the Minister who has to administer the law with regard to the remission of life sentences, so that the prisoner should not be left entirely without hope in case he redeems his character after undergoing punishment for a long period. But, in saying this, let it not be understood that I have made up my mind upon either of these points absolutely, since, before any practical decision can be arrived at, the whole matter must undergo very careful consideration.

Mr. Thomas Chambers

Mr. SULLIVAN said, he did not understand the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert) to object to any remission of life sentences, but merely to propose that in cases where those sentences had to be carried out in their entirety a separate place of confinement should be provided for those undergoing penal servitude for life. He had no desire to aggravate that punishment, or to lay down any rule by which the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown in remitting the punishment was to be controlled. He had risen for the purpose of calling the attention of the Home Secretary to a Return laid upon the table of that House in 1865 in relation to penal servitude in Ireland, which showed the number of prisoners undergoing penal servitude for life, the crimes for which that sentence had been awarded, and the number of cases in which the punishment of death had been remitted to that of penal servitude. It appeared from that Return that on the 14th of June, 1865, out of thirty-eight persons who were then undergoing penal servitude for life, ten of these had been found guilty of murder, and sentenced to death, but their sentences had been commuted; one was a case of manslaughter. Of the remaining twenty-seven persons eight were for crimes of violence to the person, two had been convicted of having base coin in their possession after a previous conviction, one for sheep stealing, after a previous felony. One was for robbery from the person, two for highway robbery, one for sacrilege, four for burglary, one for burglary and robbery, and others for robbery. If therefore, as had been suggested, it were made an inflexible rule that no application for the remission of life sentences should be entertained till after twenty years, it would operate very harshly on prisoners whose offences had been of a much less serious character than murder. He felt no hesitation in saying that, in many of the cases set out in the Return, no such sentence as that of penal servitude for life ought ever to have been passed. With regard to persons who had given such reins to their passions as wilfully to take the life of a fellow-creature, he thought they could rarely be allowed to regain their liberty, and that their confinement was necessary for the protection of society. He believed that the subjects of life sentences were humanely treated, and that there was no reason to fear the infliction of the severities deprecated by the hon. and learned Member for Marylebone (Mr. Chambers.)

Mr. Walpole

BRITISH TROOPS IN NEW ZEALAND.

OBSERVATIONS.

Mr. GORST said, he rose to call the attention of the House to the proposal to maintain permanently a British regiment in New Zealand. The House had been informed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Adderley) that it was proposed to excuse the colony from bearing the cost of that regiment on condition of its voting £50,000 a year for Native purposes. An item of between £60,000 and £70,000 accordingly appeared in the Estimates for the support of that force, and he presumed that in the event of further disturbances the cost would be considerably increased. He regarded that expenditure both as unnecessary and as positively injurious to the colony; but, as the right hon. Gentleman had promised to lay on the table papers on the subject, he would now content himself with apologizing for having troubled the House, and with asking when those papers would be ready, in order that he might renew his notice on a future occasion.

MR. ADDERLEY said, the question was one of no inconsiderable importance, and the hon. Gentleman had no need to apologize for calling attention to this matter, there being no Member of the House better acquainted with the affairs of New Zealand than he was. The Correspondence was already in the hands of the printer, and he hoped that in about ten days it would be laid on the table of the House. There were in November last 4,000 British soldiers in the colony, but orders had been sent for 3,000 to leave, and they had probably done so, only one regiment remaining. That arrangement for the retention of one regiment at the cost of this country, however, was only temporary, the facts being these:—In 1860 the colony made a proposal to pay the Imperial Treasury £5 per head for all the troops in New Zealand, and that proposal was accepted. In 1861, the Governor, Sir George Grey, sent home a plan for the amelioration of the condition of the Native population, the estimated cost being £50,000 a year, upon which the Government returned the £5 head money in part payment of that sum. In 1864 the late Colonial Secretary, in dealing with the question of guaranteeing a loan of £1,000,000 to New Zealand, proposed that, save as to one regiment, New Zealand should come under the same arrangement which prevailed in the case of Australia, and should pay £40 per head for infantry, and £55 for artillery; but that, in consideration of the attitude of the Native population, one regiment should be maintained, not permanently but temporarily, by the Imperial Treasury, the £50,000 annually for Native purposes being defrayed by the colony as long as that regiment remained. In 1865 a resolution was passed by the Colonial Legislature, which was interpreted as declining to pay that rate for the troops, and much correspondence had ensued, the result being that only one regiment would remain. Many of the colonists, including Mr. Weld when Prime Minister, were adverse to the stay even of that regiment, and the present Ministry, though they had not displayed so strong a feeling, appeared anxious to develop the self-reliance of the colony. Indeed, he was bound to say that no colony had shown a higher spirit, both in money matters and in undertaking its own defence, than New Zealand. The present arrangement, and also the question of the debt owing by the colony to the Imperial Treasury, were both open to reconsideration. He hoped to be able to lay on the table the papers referred to in the course of the ensuing week, or early in the week following.

MR. CARDWELL said, he desired to add one word to what had been correctly stated by his right hon. Friend. Three years ago there were more than 10,000 men in New Zealand who were spending £1,000,000 a year. A large debt was then running up from the colony to the Imperial Treasury, and in addition the colony applied to the Home Government to guarantee a loan of £3,000,000. The arrangement made was that the Government should guarantee not £3,000,000, but £1,000,000; that the troops, if they remained, should be paid for by the colony at the rate of the payment made by the Australian colonies, and that the debt should be closed and liquidated. This arrangement was not only laid upon the table, but the House, approving it, required that it should be embodied in the statute. The result was that the colonists determined to pray for the recall of the Queen's troops, and they had accordingly been recalled. He was only sorry that any portion of them still remained in New Zealand; but for any beyond one regiment that remained permanently, the full amount of the head money agreed to be paid for troops in Australia was to be paid. It was, however, thought that under the circumstances of the Native population, it would be unreasonable to recall all the troops, and one regiment was to remain, to be maintained at the Imperial expense, on condition that the colony continued to devote £50,000 a year to Native purposes. The arrangement was, on the face of it, liable to revision at a future time; and if the colony of New Zealand did not desire any longer to insist on the terms, no doubt the English Parliament would be willing to re-consider the arrangement.

SHIPPING RETURNS.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. CANDLISH said, he rose to call attention to a Return of "the number and tonnage of Vessels entered inwards and cleared outwards at each of the twelve principal Ports of the United Kingdom, &c.," during the year 1865; and to move for Returns showing the number of Vessels and tonnage entered inwards and cleared outwards at each of the twelve Ports of the United Kingdom at which the aggregate tonnage entered and cleared has been largest during the year 1866 ; of the official and declared value of Imports and Exports at each of the twelve ports of the United Kingdom at which the aggregate of such Exports and Imports has been largest during the year 1866 ; and of the number of Vessels and amount of tonnage registered at each of the twelve Ports of the United Kingdom at which the largest amount of tonnage was registered on the 31st day of December, 1866. The Return in question was in many respects inaccurate, and calculated to lead to erroneous conclusions. It referred to "the twelve principal Ports of the United Kingdom ;" but the House would be surprised to learn that only seven of the Reports named in the Return came under that designation. The remaining five ports were inferior, as to tonnage and clearance, to the ports of Cardiff, Sunderland, Hartlepool, Swansea, and Grimsby. In several other respects, also, the Return was inaccurate. The entrances and clearances at the port he had the honour to represent (Sunderland) were larger than the entrances and clearances of five of the ports included in the Return. The same observation applied to other ports which were omitted, and the test of tonnage gave a similar result. If the Return were again moved for he hoped it would be so modified as to convey an accurate idea of the facts.

Mr. STEPHEN CAVE said, that the speech of the hon. Member for Sunderland proved, he thought, one thing—namely, the inexpediency of granting so easily many of the Returns for which Motions were annually made by Members of that House. The attention of the House ought to be directed to that question of unopposed Returns. In his humble opinion there should be some hesitation in asking for and in granting Returns which were only intended to serve a particular purpose of perhaps no general interest, as well as those which were contained in books in the Library or in annual Reports laid before Parliament and distributed among Members. The practice was a growing one, and one which had caused much anxiety to his hon. Friend the Secretary of the Treasury, as entailing a heavy expense upon the country. That Return, for instance, to which the hon. Member had not without reason taken exception, was moved for many years ago and had been continued every year since. He was sorry it was so continued. It always had been, and must still be, incomplete ; and, whatever might have been the case originally, the title of it certainly was incorrect now. Those ports having been once selected, the Return seemed kept for comparison with former years. The expense of printing those Returns was, as he had said, very great ; but that represented a very small part of the whole cost of the country. In the Customs and other Departments a special staff was obliged to be maintained for that exceptional work, in order that the regular work of the office might not be delayed. Now, the annual statement of trade and navigation distributed to every Member of Parliament and to every Chamber of Commerce throughout the country contained the following particulars :—1, Number and tonnage of vessels entered at each port in the United Kingdom ; 2, number and tonnage of vessels under as well as above fifty tons registered at each port ; 3, the value of exports at each port ; and 4, the amount of Customs duty received at each port, besides much other information. The only Return for which the hon. Member moved which he had not enumerated as given in these statistical tables was that of the official value of imports and exports, which, as the hon. Gentleman would see from a note to the Return of which he complained, could not be given without enormous labour and expense, as the value had never been computed except for imports and exports of the kingdom at large. He found no fault with the hon. Member's objection to the title "principal ports." It was very difficult to define principal ports in such Returns. Some ports had more vessels entered and cleared and less registered tonnage, and to take one and omit the other would give rise to jealousy. For instance, at Cardiff there were, according to last Returns, only 121 ships of 18,481 tons registered, and 5,970 ships of 1,921,030 tons entered and cleared. At Bristol there were 388 ships of 62,155 tons registered, and only 1,291 ships of 333,589 tons entered and cleared. Many ships were registered at the place where the owner resided. Many, for instance, were registered in London which were not built there and never traded from it ; and registers were transferred from port to port by a simple letter to the Customs. Again, Bristol imported a great deal and exported little. The great coal ports did exactly the contrary. Nor was Customs duty a criterion. A sugar port would figure far above its proper rank. Nor was value less delusive. Then there were disputes about the area which Returns ought to include. Newcastle thought the aggregate of the Tyne should be given; Shields that the ports should figure separately. If the Government listened to all appeals for alterations, the expense, trouble, and delay would be immense. He was glad the hon. Member did not press his Motion, as it would be impossible to give all the Returns he wished; but he would undertake to confer with the hon. Member for Liverpool (who was unhappily absent on account of a domestic calamity), and either discontinue altogether the Returns of which the hon. Gentleman complained, which, he thought, would be the best plan, or alter the title, which, he quite agreed with the hon. Member, was inaccurate and calculated to mislead.

Mr. Candlish

IRELAND—RAILWAYS.—RESOLUTION.

MR. BLAKE said, he rose to call attention to the Act of last Session intitled "The Railway Companies (Ireland) Temporary Advances Act, 1866," and to move that it is the opinion of this House that, with a view of affording to Irish Railways the full relief contemplated by the said Act, it is expedient, under existing circumstances, that the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury should exercise the powers conferred on them under the fourth Section, by directing that the period within which temporary advances should be made be extended to the maximum period allowed by the Act. He felt it was rather a novel proceeding to ask the House to express its opinion that an important public Department should do its duty by carrying into effect the manifest intention of both Houses of Legislature as expressed in an Act of Parliament. He would not have troubled the House with this matter only that he had exhausted every means to try and induce the Treasury to do what he considered they ought in conformity with the spirit of the Act referred to. He came before the House on behalf and at the express desire of very large railway interests in Ireland to ask that what was determined on by Parliament last year should be carried into the full effect intended. Towards the close of last Session, in consequence of the very strong representations made of the difficulties in which several Irish railway companies were placed, owing to the general money panic, but more particularly to the want of confidence in all Irish securities in consequence of the Fenian conspiracy, the late Administration resolved to bring in a Bill to temporarily assist Irish lines in their emergency to the extent of £500,000. The 4th clause would explain the terms on which the loans were granted—

"1. Every Loan shall be made either for the Purpose of discharging the Principal of Money temporarily borrowed and actually applied within Three Calendar Months before the passing of this Act in discharging Principal Money secured by any Debentures or other Securities of the Company duly issued before the passing of this Act pursuant to the Acts relating to the Company, or for the Purpose of discharging the Principal Money secured on any such Debentures or other Securities due at the Time of the passing of this Act, or falling due within Three Calendar Months afterwards, or within such further Period not exceeding Twelve Calendar Months from the passing of this Act as the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury may from Time to Time direct."

This Act was subsequently passed by the present Government. By the 4th clause the Public Works Loan Commissioners, at whose disposal the money was placed, were authorized on their own responsibility to advance loans due on debentures falling due within three months after the passing of the Act. All debentures due at periods beyond that time could not be liquidated by Government advances unless by the express sanction of the Treasury. The Loan Commissioners made advances when they deemed the security satisfactory to the full extent allowed them, but the whole sum lent by them for bonds falling due within three months after the passing of the Act was, he believed, under £200,000. Therefore, fully £300,000 of the sum voted by Parliament remained undisposed of, the greater portion of the debenture debt being due at periods beyond the three months. Under these circumstances, the Treasury was applied to to exercise the powers vested in it to grant loans for debts falling due beyond the period within which the Loan Commissioners were empowered to act. To the surprise, however, of the applicants, the Treasury refused to exercise their powers for the purpose. He (Mr. Blake) had some interviews with the Secretary to remonstrate against this decision, but without effect. The reasons assigned by the right hon. Gentleman (and which, he supposed, would be again advanced that night as he had resolved to oppose the Motion) were, that the chief reason Government recommended Parliament to grant the aid to Irish railways was in consequence of the high rate of interest at the time the Act was passed, fully 10 per cent, but that, as it was now down to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, railway companies, if their security was good, ought to go to the money-market to supply their wants; and that the fact of being now willing to give the Government 4 or 5 per cent went far to prove that the security offered was not unexceptionable. He (Mr. Blake) denied altogether the accuracy of the assertion of the Secretary to the Treasury that the high rate of interest was the chief reason why Government recommended aid to be given to Irish railways, and would refer to the hon. Gentleman's own speech when the subject was under discussion, to show that it was not the principal plea which Government put forward to induce the House to comply with their recommendation. He would now endeavour to show that, in a strictly financial point of view, railways were not in a better position at present than they were when the Bill was passed to obtain loans on debenture bonds. These securities partook very much of the character of investments, and in the height of the money panic the interest on good investments was not beyond what it was now. But Irish railways, in common with similar securities in England, even if no political causes had existed at all to depreciate the value of the former, were in a much worse position to raise money than they were six months ago. The decision of Baron Cairns respecting debenture bonds had so reduced their value as a security that nearly every one having them, except in very prosperous lines, were trying to realize often at a very large loss, and few would be induced to touch them. In this respect Irish lines suffered in common with those of England; but in addition companies in Ireland had their property depreciated in consequence of the Fenian disturbances, and in that respect were much worse than when the Bill passed. If the existence of Fenianism was a good reason when the Bill passed for making concessions to Irish railways, it could now be advanced with additional force as an argument for giving full effect to the spirit of the Act, which the Treasury resolutely refused to do. The Fenian threatenings in 1866 had culminated in actual outbreak in 1867, and had made matters, with regard to Irish securities, especially railway property, much worse—

Mr. Blake

and in consequence the companies found it quite impossible to get their debenture bonds taken up at interest they could offer; it was not a question of interest but of confidence, and there was an absence of that to an extent that left many companies unable to meet their liabilities. [The hon. MEMBER having read portions of the debate of last Session to show that Fenianism was a chief ground of the Bill then introduced, proceeded to say.] He supposed they were now satisfied that the rate at which Fenianism was going on in June last, and not the rate of interest, was the main reason for the introduction and passing of the Act. Now, what was the present position of matters? True discounts had gone down, but certainly Fenianism had gone up. The gracious Speech of Her Majesty at the opening of Parliament announced that Ireland had become so tranquil that the Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act would be removed. In little more than a week there was open rebellion in Kerry. That was suppressed, and half-a-dozen, or perhaps a dozen, similar demonstrations took place in different parts of Ireland, which surprised every one, and, he believed, none more than the Government, as they evidently did not expect so practical a denial of their statement, that Ireland had become tranquil and well affected. The effect on money-lenders was such as might be expected—they closed their coffers so far as Ireland was concerned, wisely remarking that when Government were so much out in their calculations about Ireland they would not venture their money there. The most sensitive of all sensitive things was capital, and on the present occasion it shrank from coming in contact with Fenianism. The directors of many of those lines had pledged their own personal security for large amounts to sustain their companies—in one instance to the extent of £60,000; but there must be a limit somewhere to men involving themselves personally for matters in which they were only interested as shareholders, probably to an extent far below the heavy liabilities they undertook, to save from destruction the undertakings in their charge. They had, through him, appealed to the Treasury to help them through their difficulties by simply carrying out the Act of last Session, but had been refused; and he seriously warned the House and Government that, if the application then made failed, the consequences would probably prove most disastrous to the country, and even to the Government itself, as some of the lines applying for aid were in the centre of the scene of the Fenian disturbances. The Secretary of the Treasury told him that without a vote of the House the Treasury would not relax their determination; and he (Mr. Blake) confidently appealed to the House, for the sake of the important interests involved, to confirm the wise and previous decision they came to last Session with regard to sustaining Irish railways in their struggle with difficulties caused by the exceptional circumstances in which they were unfortunately placed by difficulties for which neither proprietors or directors were accountable.

Mr. POLLARD-URQUHART seconded the Motion. He wished to guard himself against the supposition that he was suing for the Irish railways in forma pauperis. There were peculiar circumstances which existed now which did not exist at the commencement of this undertaking. Great part of the hostility of the malcontents seemed to be directed against railways, and therefore the value of railway property was peculiarly affected by this unfortunate conspiracy. Then another thing which had depreciated the value of railway property was the recent decision of Lord Justice Cairns. He contended that these two reasons were quite sufficient to justify himself and his friends in asking that the Act of last Session should be carried out in no niggard spirit. In conclusion, he would express the hope that the Government would give a favourable consideration to the Motion which had been made.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is the opinion of this House that, with a view to affording to Irish Railways the full relief contemplated by the Act of last Session, intituled, 'The Railway Companies (Ireland) Temporary Advances Act, 1866,' it is expedient, under existing circumstances, that the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury should exercise the powers conferred on them under the fourth Section, by directing that the period within which temporary advances should be made be extended to the maximum period allowed by the Act,"—(Mr. Blake.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Mr. HUNT said, that the Act, the operation of which the hon. Gentleman asked the Government to extend, was one of a very exceptionable and peculiar nature, it being an Act to enable the Government to advance money to Irish railway companies to pay off debt. Previously to its passing he was not aware of any case in which public money had been advanced, except for the execution of works. The policy of successive Governments in late years had been to lend money at a low rate of interest to promote public improvements; but he believed that the Act he had just referred to was the first instance where public money had been advanced to pay off debts. It was regarded with jealousy when introduced, and the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) observed at the time that the measure required to be watched, or it would form a dangerous precedent. The circumstances under which the late Government undertook to introduce the measure were set forth in two Treasury Minutes laid on the table of the House last year. The first Minute was dated May 24, and it began with a statement that a deputation consisting of gentlemen largely interested in Irish railways waited on Earl Russell and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and represented that, in consequence of the then existing monetary derangement, it was not only impossible for these railway companies generally to obtain money for the works in progress on reasonable terms, but that many of them were called upon to repay at a short notice large sums borrowed on mortgage and other security for the prosecution of their works; that Earl Russell and Mr. Gladstone found difficulty in adopting any scheme of a permanent nature affecting railways in Ireland until the Royal Commission on Railways should have made their Report; but that this objection would not apply with equal force to temporary measures taken in view especially of the existing derangement of the money-market; and they recommend that the Public Works Loan Commissioners should be authorized to advance during the next three months on the security of debentures already issued, and being overdue or falling due within that time, sums not exceeding in the whole £500,000 for one year at a rate of interest not less than 4 per cent, upon being satisfied as to the sufficiency of the security offered. Before the expiration of the three months, it was likewise stated in the Minute, it would be open for consideration whether circumstances might render any further extension of the period advisable. He wished the House to observe that the reason stated for the advance was the existence of derangement in the money-market—the Bank rate of discount, he believed, being 10 per cent when the Minute was framed, and when the Bill was brought in by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer and himself the Bank rate of discount was still at that figure. With respect to the question whether the period in which the debentures falling due were to be paid by money raised under the Act should be extended, there was a second Treasury Minute, dated June 15, which stated that another deputation had been to the Treasury and urged that the power of the Public Works Loan Commissioners to lend money should be continued by the Act for a period of three years, so as to enable any debenture falling due during that time to be taken up. The Minute went on to state that Mr. Childers said that should circumstances hereafter require an extension of the period, during which the lending and borrowing powers were to be exercised, it would seem the more proper course to seek from Parliament in a future Session an extension of the powers. When the Bill was introduced the Chancellor of the Exchequer rested the case for it, as the first Treasury Minute did, on the derangement of the money-market. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Blake) had said that he (Mr. Hunt) alluded to the Fenian disturbances. It was true that he did allude to them as aggravating the difficulties, but he did not rest the case solely on that ground—as he had said the main consideration was the state of the money-market. Now, what had taken place under the Act? The Public Works Loan Commissioners were solely to be the judges of the security, and had power to make advances without reference to the Treasury in all cases within the meaning of the Act, with this single exception—that they could not extend the time without Treasury sanction. £500,000 were destined for the purpose of the Act, and there had been applications for the loan to the extent of £926,089. Of that amount there had been refused on account of insufficiency of security applications for £226,992, and applications for £244,865 had been refused on account of not coming within the limit of the Act. Sums to the amount of £123,796 had been advanced, and loans which had been agreed to be advanced to the amount of £10,700 had not been taken up. In addition, one company had withdrawn their application.

Mr. Hunt

Now what was the state of things when the time was about to expire? At that period the monetary derangement had entirely passed away, and the Bank rate of discount had fallen from 10 per cent to 4 or 4½ per cent. Therefore the monetary considerations which had induced the Government to introduce the Bill had entirely disappeared; and the view of the Government was, under the circumstances, that parties could go into the market for their money. He would mention a fact which confirmed the view of the Government on that point. A large sum of money was applied for by one of the companies in Ireland, and it was found on examination that a great part of the sum did not fall within the meaning of the Act. A certain portion, however—£34,000—did fall within the time, and the Commissioners offered to advance that sum on the same terms as they advanced money to other companies—namely, at £5 per cent. The company then informed the Commissioners that in such case they declined the offer, as the public offered better terms. [An hon. MEMBER: What was the date?] The date of that transaction was the 30th of October; and this he contended was a confirmation of the propriety of the decision of the Government at the time that decision was taken. That being so, the House, he thought, would be of opinion that the Board were justified in the view they took that the exceptional state of things which induced the Government to bring in this Bill having passed away, they would not be justified in extending the time beyond the three months limited by the 4th clause. The Government took this view—that supposing the state of things existing now had existed when the measure was introduced, they would not have introduced it. The present Government would not, and he did not believe the late Government would have introduced it; and he might say the House would not, in his opinion, have assented to it, except under the exceptional circumstances then existing. The passing of the measure had, as many predicted, given rise to various applications for Government loans for various purposes; and this showed that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Henley) was quite right in saying that it would be a dangerous precedent. The other day a large and influential deputation waited on the Ministers of the Crown and applied for loans to pay off debts incurred in the construction of works of public utility; and they represented that they would be able by getting loans from the Government to save the high rate they were now paying for the money they had taken up in order to construct those works. Such a policy was passim exempli, and he heard of other applications about to be made, as if the Government were a great "Credit Company," bound to find money for all persons who could not get it elsewhere, or to lend at a lower than the current rate of interest in the market. He did not see any difference between Irish railways and certain English railways. It might be said the Fenian outbreak had affected the question. No doubt it did to a certain extent. We had no Fenian disturbance here, except at Chester, and that did not alarm us much; yet many railway companies in this country had great difficulty in taking up their debentures; and why should they mete one measure to Ireland and another to England? Supposing the House were of opinion that they ought to comply with the terms of the Motion, he confessed he did not see how they could resist applications from railway companies in this country. He thought the special circumstances attending the monetary crisis under which the Act was passed having entirely passed away, they would not have been justified in using the powers given under the Act, which were never intended for the state of things which now existed, but only applied to the contingency of the rate of interest keeping up during the Parliamentary recess. If they adopted this Resolution, he did not see how they could resist applications from other quarters of a similar nature, and he confessed the amount of such applications and the number of them would be perfectly appalling to any one filling the position he had the honour to do. He therefore hoped the House would not assent to the Motion, but leave the matter as it now stood on the decisions come to last October.

MR. LAWSON said, what his hon. Friend (Mr. Blake) asked was not to extend the operation of the Act, but to pass a Resolution that it is expedient that the Commissioners of the Treasury should act on powers already given by the Act of Parliament. The Secretary of the Treasury had spoken of applications from other companies; but he seemed entirely to forget that the English Companies had no Act of Parliament. The Legislature last Session passed an Act placing at the disposal of Irish railways, under certain conditions, a sum of £500,000 for taking up debentures falling due within three months after the passing of the Act, without application to the Treasury, and debentures falling due in twelve months subject to the approval of the Commissioners; and the only thing asked was that the Commissioners of the Treasury should exercise their discretion of granting these loans, although the debentures had fallen due at a longer period than three months after the passing of the Act. There was no possible danger to the public revenue in this, for the Loan Commissioners were directed not to make loans unless the security were both sufficient and proper. The necessity for such loans was just as great now as when the Act passed. The Legislature meant that the whole £500,000 should be appropriated for that purpose if proper security were given for it, and the other conditions mentioned in the Act complied with; but of this sum only £144,000 had been advanced; and therefore, he contended, there was no reason, either connected with the state of Ireland or the public funds, why the extension proposed should not be granted. Nothing but common justice was asked; and he could not but contrast the grudging and niggard spirit in which these loans were administered with what they had heard from deputations to the Viceroy and otherwise about the generous and enlightened policy the Government were prepared to pursue towards the sister country, pledging their belief, and almost their assurance, that very great aid would be given to Irish railways. He trusted the Secretary of the Treasury would re-consider the matter.

MR. M'KENNA desired to make a few remarks in reference to the objection which had been urged to a compliance with the requests of Irish railways, where applications for loans were not made within the three months provided by the Act. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury had referred to the fact that at the time the Bill received the sanction of the House the rate of interest in the general market was 10 per cent per annum. This was doubtless true, and it constituted one ingredient in the conditions of pressure under which the railways then suffered; it could not, however, have operated as an inducement to Parliament to help them, for it rendered any help then given a cost and loss to the State. The pressure on the railway companies now arose from one cause only; but if that cause were adequate the Government were bound to use their powers to continue the operation of the Act, for the railways were not now asking any concession whatever at the expense of the State; the companies were prepared to secure to the country 5 per cent per annum, and this money would cost the country under 3½. The present pressure on the Irish railway companies mainly arose from the panic of investors consequent on the Fenian movements. No one could have less nervousness on the subject of that movement than he (Mr. M'Kenna.) But fears which were unwarranted and contemptible did prevail, and were sufficient to paralyse industry and injure credit. He hoped that these railway companies which were constituted of the best friends of order in Ireland would receive from the Government at this juncture that consideration which Parliament so lately sanctioned.

MR. CHILDERS said, he did not wish to enter into the general question; but he understood the Secretary of the Treasury, in the remarks he had made, to intimate that the Bill of last year was likely to prove an inconvenient precedent. He had said that that Bill was pessimi exempli, and that if its principle was correct, what they had done for Ireland they might be called upon to do for England. But he (Mr. Childers) wished to point out that there was no need to fear that the railways of England would have a better title to the assistance of Parliament in consequence of the passing of the Act of last year. In reply to the same objection, which had been taken last year, he had explained that the railways of Ireland stood in a very different position from those of England. The English railways had been constructed entirely by private enterprise, whereas the Irish railways had been constructed to a great extent by means of loans from the Public Works Commissioners, which had to be repaid by yearly instalments. The Government, therefore, having lent the money for the construction of the lines, and having been repaid large sums, the re-payment of which, with the addition of the sinking fund, had compelled the companies to borrow on debentures; and those debentures having been, in the pressure of last year, unrenovable, it was not, he thought, unreasonable to allow them as a temporary loan a portion of the money that they had made in re-payments. He hoped that the hon. Member for Northamptonshire (Mr. Hunt) would not still maintain that the Act of last year would justify the English railway companies in asking for similar relief.

MR. HUNT explained that what he said was, that if this Motion were acceded to there would be a difficulty in resisting a similar application on behalf of the English companies under similar circumstances.

MR. CHILDERS had not asked the hon. Member to accede to the present application.

MR. SYNAN said, that the influences that had deranged the finances of Irish railways last year were still in operation, and therefore the Government were bound to carry out the intention of the Act passed in the last Session. Good security and high interest were offered for the loan, and he could not see why Government should decline to carry out the intention of the Act. All that was asked was that they should examine the securities the railways had to offer, and if they were satisfied to advance the money.

SIR HENRY WINSTON-BARRON reminded the House that the Act under which this application was made was passed at a time when the money-market was deranged by the rate for money varying from 10 to 12 per cent. Since then there had come the Fenian outbreak, and the consequence was that the money-market was more deranged than ever. It was more difficult now than it was last year to get money, either for the English or Irish railways. He wished to remind the House that the Government would really gain by this scheme, for they would be able to borrow money at 3 per cent, while they would lend it to the Irish railways at 5. As for the securities, there could be no doubt about their value, because, in fact, the Government would examine their value for themselves. If the loan were refused let Parliament depend upon it that the Irish people would not forget the circumstance.

MR. J. B. SMITH had been disposed to object to this Motion, as he understood that it was an application for money to assist Irish railways, which he thought ought on principle not to be acceded to. But he found on examination that the application was only to carry into effect the provisions of an Act of Parliament which had been passed by universal consent last Session; it was not a new application for a loan to which he would have objected, and in the peculiar condition of affairs in Ireland he hoped the Government would accede to the renewal of the loan which Parliament had authorized.

Mr. M'Kenna

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The matter now before us is one which, since we succeeded to office, has much engaged my attention. The position of the railways in Ireland had attracted the attention of our predecessors in office, and they had entered into arrangements and engagements, probably not to be vindicated by strict principles of political economy, but which yet might be defended on grounds of political justice. We accepted the position which was left to us by our predecessors, and it appeared to me one in which the State might interfere with very great advantage to Ireland, and, generally speaking, in a manner which could be defended on every principle of sound policy. What were the circumstances? They were laid before us by deputations headed by persons of great position in Ireland, and who sit in both Houses of Parliament. There was then a monetary panic of a peculiar character, which doubtless does not exist at the present moment, though its consequences remain, and naturally must remain, to some extent, in a country situated like Ireland. We found that the means of communication in that country were endangered, and it was possible circumstances might arise which would interrupt the public communications in a manner not merely injurious to the interests of Ireland, but of the Empire. We agreed to assist the Irish railways under certain conditions, which I think were well considered, and so conceived as to effect, not only the purposes which we desired, but to secure the public interest and to protect the public resources of this country. No doubt, the state of affairs in a monetary sense has changed. No one can say now that he is obliged to pay 10 per cent as the minimum rate of interest at the Bank; but, at the same time, the consequences, even in England, of the great anxieties of that period are seriously felt, and property of this kind has not yet recovered its proper and natural condition. But, in addition, the social condition of Ireland is different from that of England. In Ireland there are social circumstances of a very perplexing character which exercise a most injurious effect on its industry, on the employment of its capital, and, of course, on the employment of its labour. I do not want to intrude the Fenian invasion into this discussion, which is one relating purely to a matter of business; but, as that subject has been introduced, it is impossible to shut our eyes to the remarkable consequences of that almost unprecedented state of affairs. What the Fenian movement is I do not at this moment understand, although in the course of the day I receive several telegrams on the subject, and give them very anxious consideration. I believe it is rather to be accounted for by physical than political causes. I know that in the Middle Ages there was a "dancing mania," and whole nations fell into fits of dancing, and passed the borders of contiguous countries till they accomplished a distance of 3,000 leagues. There is no doubt that there is an epileptic feeling which affects nations like individuals, and I can only account for the Fenian movement on the epileptic principle. There is no doubt that movement has affected the value and position of railway property in Ireland. Whether the Fenian invasion is as bad as a 10 per cent minimum rate it is very difficult to say; but there are many Members on both sides of the House who are no doubt competent to consider the proposition, and in due time to give us the result. I can only take a rough estimate. I look on the Irish railways now as being almost in the identical position which they were when we acceded to office, and succeeded to the policy of our predecessors. I wish to carry out that policy in its integrity. I do not want to change it. I do not propose to change it, and I will not sanction any change in it. If the Irish railways can come forward and give us good security it will be the duty of the Government, in compliance with the original arrangement, naming a period which has not yet been completed, candidly to consider their claims. They will be considered, I must fairly tell them, with the severity that becomes the office which I hold. If they can offer us ample and complete security, then I think the duty of the Government will be to give them that assistance which the legislation of last year approved and authorized us to afford.

MR. BRADY expressed his satisfaction at the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and said that had the reply of the Secretary of the Treasury been as explicit and straightforward, there would have been no occasion for entering upon the discussion. He was rejoiced at the course taken by the Government, being convinced that had it not been adopted the most serious results would have taken place in regard to railway property in Ireland.

MR. BLAKE also thanked the right

hon. Gentleman for his very satisfactory speech, and begged to withdraw his Motion.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

FLOGGING IN THE ARMY.

RESOLUTION.

MR. OTWAY, in rising to move the Resolution of which he had given notice—

"That this House, reserving for future consideration when requisite the question of the exigencies of a state of war, is of opinion that it is unnecessary that the punishment of Flogging should be awarded during the time of peace to Soldiers of the Army or Corps of Royal Marines serving on shore," said, that he had given notice of this Resolution with a view to elicit a declaration as to the inexpediency of continuing the system of flogging in the army. The present moment appeared to him most opportune for mooted such a question, as it appeared that additional burdens were about to be laid upon the country to induce men to enter the army. The subject was, in his eyes, of such paramount importance that he would have hesitated, humble as he was, to bring it before them if it had not been for the deep convictions he entertained on the subject, and for the support he knew he would obtain from many Members of the House. The subject had been formerly brought before the House of Commons by the hon. Member for Brighton, by the hon. Member for Leicester, and others, who objected to that clause in the Mutiny Bill which authorized the punishment. But he thought the division lists on those occasions showed that the question had never been fairly submitted to the judgment of the House. In the first Reformed Parliament the subject was brought forward by a relative of his own, and one of the most distinguished men in it—the late Sir Francis Burdett—who proposed to restrict corporal punishment to three offences, and there appeared on a division the very small majority of 11 against Sir Francis Burdett's proposition. To prevent the question being again brought forward as was threatened, Mr. Ellice, who was then Secretary at War, issued orders on the authority of the King William IV., to commanding officers of regiments, restricting the punishment of flogging to certain heinous offences—mutiny, insubordination, or violence to a superior officer, drunkenness on duty, sale or making away with arms, munitions, or necessities, stealing from comrades, or other disgraceful practices. But how did the question stand at the present day? He feared, by the Returns on the table of the House, that the question had retrograded since that time. The offences for which flogging was inflicted had increased from seven to seventeen. The number of men flogged in 1830 was 658; in 1831 it was 646; in 1832 it was 485, and in 1833 it was 370. It was remarkable that whenever a discussion had taken place in Parliament on the subject the result had been a diminution in the number of floggings, and that the amelioration which had taken place in the military code of the country had arisen from the opinions expressed by civilians in Parliament in opposition to the views of military men. The number of men flogged in 1863 was 518, and the number of lashes inflicted 23,668; the number of men in 1864 was 528, and the number of lashes, 25,638; the number of men in 1865 was 441, and the number of lashes 21,561. So that, in point of numbers, more men were flogged in 1865 than at a previous period when the matter was very little considered, though it must be mentioned that the number of men now in the army was much greater. There were certain offences also now punishable which did not find a place in the order to which he had alluded. In 1865 men were flogged for habitual drunkenness, breaking out of prison, disobedience of orders, loss of necessities, unlawful possession, drunkenness in camp, and one man had been flogged for an offence new to him, entitled "miscellaneous." He wished to call the attention of the House particularly to two of those offences which were punishable with flogging—habitual drunkenness and desertion. It was unnecessary to describe the nature of the punishment itself. In many cases it went far beyond the intention of those by whom it was awarded, and in a recent case a man had died in hospital at Limerick after a severe flogging. He submitted that if it were possible that death should result from the punishment, the punishment ought to be abolished altogether. The Returns before the House showed that the punishment was utterly inefficient as a remedial measure. A most valuable Return entitled "Subsequent Conduct of Men who have been Flogged," most clearly proved this. It had been stated that the word "desertion" had suddenly come into the Mutiny Act in 1858, and that many men had since that time been punished for an offence which was intended to be excluded from the Bill. Now, if there was any one offence for which a man ought not to be subject to this punishment, it was that of desertion. How did a man enter the army? He was frequently entrapped by some wily sergeant when in a state of intoxication, and when he recovered he instinctively ran from the trap in which he had been caught. No doubt a man deserved some punishment for such an offence; but he ought not to be subjected to the most degrading punishment that could be inflicted. Of all offences "desertion" ought to be excluded from the list, except that of drunkenness. In 1865 the number of men flogged for desertion was seventy-two, and for habitual drunkenness, twenty-seven. When a man had been convicted of habitual drunkenness three times, he was brought before a court martial for the fourth offence, and degraded to the second class. Now, what was the case with respect to an officer offending in a similar way? At Agra a captain on the Staff was arraigned the other day, charged with conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman, prejudicial to good order and military discipline, in having been drunk at a public banquet given by the Maharajah of Jey-pore, an ally of Her Majesty, and caused such a disturbance that he had to be removed by force. The Court found him guilty of the charge, and sentenced him to be severely reprimanded. The sentence was approved and confirmed by W. R. M. Mansfield, General Commanding-in-Chief Her Majesty's Forces in India. Mark the contrast! The unhappy recruit who got muddled with beer was brought to the halberts, stripped to the waist, and flogged till the blood ran down his back, whilst the accomplished captain of the Staff who had to be removed for drunken violence was merely reprimanded. Truly might it be said—

Mr. Blake

"That in the captain's but a choleric word Which in the soldier is rank blasphemy."

If that were the treatment recruits had to expect, while at the same time they were debarred from rising to the position of an officer, how could we hope to popularize the army? It was said that the punishment was necessary for the maintenance of military discipline. But to disprove that assertion it would only be necessary, without going back as far as the Jews, who, more humane than ourselves, inflicted only forty stripes save one, or the Romans, who did not inflict the punishment at all on their soldiers, to look at the Continental armies. In the two great wars which had recently taken place, the four Continental armies had been engaged—those of Russia and Austria, France, and Prussia. In the armies of France and Prussia corporal punishment had been altogether abolished. In the Russian army it still existed. In the Austrian army it was on the decrease. And what had been the result of the different systems? The armies disciplined under the lash had been defeated, whilst those in which the lash had been abolished had achieved invariable and brilliant success. In England, also, we had seen an army in which discipline had been maintained without the lash. Flogging was unknown in that famous army of Cromwell, of which Macaulay says, "No enemy ever saw its back." And how was it with the descendants of those Cavaliers and Roundheads who had once again met in deadly strife in the new world. The lash would not be tolerated for a moment in the American army, and yet during the recent gigantic war discipline had been fully maintained. It had been said that the English soldier was an exceptional soldier, and no doubt he was so to a certain extent; but it was not necessary on that account that he should be governed by the lash. In the metropolis discipline was maintained in the three regiments of Household Cavalry without the use of the lash. It might be said that they were composed of men of a superior class. And why? No doubt the men received better pay; but he maintained that a better class of men were attracted to those regiments, because they were not subjected to that degrading punishment. During the Indian Mutiny, in one of the most gallant regiments, under the command of the hon. and gallant Member for Norwich (Sir William Russell), discipline was fully maintained without the use of the lash, and it must be a source of great satisfaction to the hon. and gallant Gentleman to find that the Returns showed a continued absence of flogging in that regiment. One word with respect to recruiting. It had been admitted by the late Secretary for War that great difficulty existed in obtaining recruits. He was surprised to find that the Recruiting Commission had so much confined themselves to a certain class of witnesses, who could afford but little information as to the reason why men did not enter the ranks. Still, there was some evidence of importance upon this point. Several of the witnesses called before the Commission stated that flogging in the army checked recruiting, and was one of the causes which rendered it less attractive than it would otherwise be; and one of them said—and he (Mr. Otway) could confirm the statement—that he had heard mothers declare that they would sooner see their sons dead than in the army. It was understood that the right hon. Gentleman the late Secretary to the Admiralty had issued orders limiting the amount of flogging in the navy. Now, it was not sufficient merely to issue orders, for orders in the army were not attended to. There was but one remedy, and that was, the entire abolition of the punishment. The House had been led to understand that there was an absolute protection to a man entering the army from this degrading punishment; and that before he was degraded to the second class he could not be punished. [Sir JOHN PAXINGTON: Hear, hear!] He (Mr. Otway) regretted to say that that was not the case—that there was no absolute protection for a soldier in the first class; for soldiers in the first class had been flogged before they were degraded into the second. The question as to those by whose orders the punishment of flogging was inflicted, opened up too wide a field for him to pursue now; but the House would remember that the regimental court martial before which a man was tried, was composed for the most part of young officers—that the tried soldier had not that protection which was given to every other citizen of the country—he was not tried by his peers. In France and in Prussia two private soldiers sat on every court martial, and their voices were equally free and powerful with those of their superior officers. No doubt the young gentlemen who constituted the judges pursued what they regarded as a proper course in sentencing men to this degrading punishment; but he maintained that it was not a satisfactory tribunal for subjecting men to such a degradation. It had been said that flogging was only given as a punishment for the gravest offences, but that that was not so was proved by the fact that regimental courts martial had power to inflict it; while the gravest offences could only be tried, not before a regimental court martial, but before a general court martial. Then, again, it was sometimes alleged that the soldiers themselves desired the retention of the punishment; but this on the face of it was incredible, and was quite counter to the testimony of those who had had opportunities of learning the feeling which they really entertained. In the Life of Sir William Napier an interesting anecdote was related of a private who, on a critical occasion, risked his life in rescuing that of his Commander, and when Sir William asked the motive for his gallant conduct, he replied, "You saved me yesterday from corporal punishment;" General Napier having, on the eve of the engagement, remitted his sentence. That man afterwards became an excellent soldier, and died a serjeant pensioner. The statement that the lash had been entirely abolished in Prussia was sometimes questioned; but he was able from a recent visit to that country, and on the authority of a Prussian officer of high rank, to assert positively that such was the fact. Corporal punishment having being thus dispensed with in France, Prussia, and America, and being on the eve of abolition in Austria, why, he would ask, should England lag behind? The House had passed a number of measures mitigating the punishment of the soldier, but always, he regretted to say, in opposition to the views of the military authorities. When the 1,000 lashes were reduced to 300, and when the barbarous punishment of tying up cavalry soldiers by the wrist with their toes suspended over spikes was abolished, it was emphatically declared that discipline could not be maintained—just as Lord Eldon predicted that if hanging for burglary were given up people would all be murdered in their beds. He remembered, too, that on a visit to Van Diemen's Land—in an innocent capacity—he found the inhabitants greatly alarmed on account of the capital penalty for sheep-stealing being abolished. He hoped the House would disregard such bugbears, and would disdain to believe that the discipline of our army was dependent on the lash. The Resolution he was about to propose did not, he admitted, go as far as he should himself prefer; but he hoped that in time of peace, at all events, a punishment so demoralizing to those who inflicted and witnessed it, as well as to those who endured it, would be abandoned. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving his Resolution.

Mr. Otway

MAJOR ANSON, in seconding the Motion, said, that he had always voted against propositions arbitrarily interfering with the power of those who were responsible for the maintenance of the discipline of the army; but it could not be denied that corporal punishment was contrary to the spirit of the age, and was condemned by public opinion. It consequently deterred a number of persons who would otherwise enlist in the army—and especially operating prejudicially on the class and description of men who actually did enter. It was time for the House to consider whether it was absolutely necessary to retain this punishment in order to maintain the discipline of the army. That flogging could be done without was shown by experience. In 1811, when the character of the men was far worse than at present, Colonel Dalrymple, who commanded the second battalion of the Scots Fusileer Guards, announced his determination never to have recourse to the punishment of flogging. Colonel Dalrymple remained in command for two years and a half, and when he was promoted, a General Order was issued by the Duke of Gloucester, setting forth that the battalion under his command had supported the character of the regiment by its uniform good conduct, that this had been effected without the infliction of corporal punishment, and that no corps were ever in a higher state of discipline. If the House wished to know the effect of corporal punishment upon the men, he would refer to a Return moved for by Lord Alfred Churchill, in 1865, of the number of men flogged in 1862, and the number of courts martial subsequently held upon the same men, with the punishments inflicted. It appeared from this Return that in 1862 there were no less than 329 men flogged, and out of this number there are only 107 who have not been since tried by court martial, and of these some 20 had their punishment extended from one to two years' imprisonment, leaving but short time to judge of their reformation; 63 had been discharged, in most cases ignominiously, from the service; of 16, no further information had been received after the first punishment; and on the rest as many as 275 further courts martial had been held, inflicting various punishments. It was certain that the punishment of the lash did not deter from the commission of subsequent offences. These figures were quite sufficient to justify the House in expressing an opinion, and the thanks of hon. Members were, he thought, due to his hon. Friend for the manner in which he had brought forward the subject, by giving the House an opportunity of expressing its opinion without taking immediate action. He trusted that if his hon. Friend should carry his Motion he would not take any steps to embody it in the Mutiny Bill of the present year. If a General Order were issued by the Commander-in-Chief suspending the punishment of flogging for a year in the army, the authorities would discover whether it would be possible to do away with corporal punishment or not. This would give both officers and men an opportunity of showing that they could do without the punishment of the lash. Such a course would, he believed, offer the easiest means of settling this difficult question.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House, reserving for future consideration when requisite the question of the exigencies of a state of war, is of opinion that it is unnecessary that the punishment of flogging should be awarded during the time of peace to Soldiers of the Army or Corps of Royal Marines serving on shore,"—(Mr. Otway.)

—instead thereof.

MR. MOWBRAY: In rising to offer a few observations in answer to the Motion so ably introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway), and so ably seconded by the hon. and gallant Member for Lichfield (Major Anson), I feel that I labour under great disadvantage in speaking merely from the experience which I have acquired in the administration of the office with which I have the honour to be connected. My hon. Friend the Member for Chatham has introduced his Motion with an announcement that he speaks on behalf, not merely of his constituents at Chatham, who are deeply interested in this question, but of the mothers of England, who are interested on account of their sons who are now in or may be likely to enlist into the British army; and he says he speaks also with the authority of experience which he obtained in our Australian colonies. The hon. and gallant Member for Lichfield also has added to the Motion the weight of the authority which he has derived from his experience during many years of distinguished service in the field. I feel that in attempting to answer those two hon. Members I labour under great disadvantage; yet I venture to say that the case which those two hon. Members have sought to make out is one that admits of a complete answer. The Motion which the hon. Member for Chatham has submitted to this House is to this effect—That during the time of peace, under all circumstances, under all conditions, in all parts of the vast extent of the British dominions, where the British army may be placed, this House will be of opinion that the punishment of flogging shall under no circumstances be awarded; and the hon. Member, in introducing the Motion, stated to the House that this question has never fairly been submitted to it. But he himself has given a complete contradiction to his own statement, by showing that from the year 1833 and down to the year 1867, on various occasions, the opinion of this House had been elicited by various Members on this question. I do not hesitate to say that to pass the Motion of the hon. Member for Chatham would be an interference on the part of the House with the discipline of the army, and one which is contrary to the opinions and judgment of those to whom the administration of the army is intrusted, and which might—I do not wish to use an exaggerated phrase, and therefore do not say that it will—effect a revolution in the army, but I do say that the result will be a fundamental change in the law; and such as I think this House will be unwilling, except in the strongest possible case, to adopt. The hon. Member for Chatham says that the question has retrograded since 1834, when the question was introduced into the Reformed House of Commons by an hon. and gallant Member (Major Fancourt), and Mr. Ellice, then Secretary at War, made certain promises to the House which were embodied in a Memorandum issued by order of King William IV. restricting the punishment of the lash to seven classes of offences. Now, the hon. Member says, the classes of offences to which the punishment is applicable have been increased from 7 to 17, and that thus the question has retrograded since 1834. Well, I felt a difficulty throughout the speech of the hon. Member for Chatham in understanding what was the nature of his objection. At one time he seemed to object to the punishment as degrading to the soldier; at another he objected on the ground that it was applied to offences to which it ought not to be applied; and it was with respect to the latter that I understood him to complain that the 7 classes of offences specified by William IV. in 1834 had been increased to 17 in 1867. But, so far from the question having retrograded during the last 33 years, I think I shall be able to show that there has been a most remarkable diminution in every respect in the amount of corporal punishment awarded within that period. He has spoken of the number of men flogged in 1831-2, and of the number of men flogged in 1863-4-5. But did the hon. Gentleman compare the number flogged with the total number of the forces at each of the two periods—the forces of the King in 1830, and the forces of the Queen in 1865? In 1830 the hon. Gentleman said the number of men flogged was 658. So they were. But that was 658 out of 88,498, or 1 man in 135. And how stands the case during the last three years? Why, in 1863 the British army, including the Indian army, consisted, not of 88,498, but 280,000 men; and the number flogged in that year was only 518, or 1 in 403. In 1864 there were 528 men flogged out of a force of 204,057 men, or 1 in 386. In 1865 there were 441 flogged out of 198,048, or only 1 in 449. Let me ask my hon. Friend the Member for Chatham whether that is not an aspect under which the question should be regarded? Let me take another point. Compare the men sentenced to corporal punishment with the number tried by courts martial. Some 40 or 50 years ago, from 1821 to 1823, every other man—1 man out of 2 of those tried—was flogged. From 1825 to 1828 1 in 5. How stands the proportion in the last three years? In 1863 there were tried by court martial 18,659 men, of whom 518 were flogged, or 1 out of 36; in 1864, there were tried 18,028, of whom 528 were flogged, or 1 in 34; in 1865, there were tried 22,261, of whom 441 were flogged, or 1 in 54. Whereas somewhere about 40 years ago every other man who was tried was flogged; in the last year the proportion was only 1 in 54. How, then, can it be said that we have retrograded on this question since the year 1834. There is another point, and that is the amount of punishment inflicted. The hon. Member has talked of the question having retrograded. Why, in 1834, a general court martial could award an unlimited number of lashes; and there is a Friend of mine sitting behind me who says he has seen 999 lashes given. I will show you the progress which has been made since that time. I am not defending the practice of by-gone days. I adduce it as a matter of history, in answer to the observation that the cause of abolition has retrograded since 1834. In that year an unlimited number of lashes could be given by a general court martial. A district court martial could inflict 300 lashes, and a regimental 200.

Mr. Mowbray

MR. OTWAY wished to explain that the right hon. Gentleman had misunderstood his argument. He had not said that they had retrograded in respect to the points to which the right hon. Member was referring, but in respect to the number and class of offences for some of which flogging was not previously inflicted.

MR. MOWBRAY: I am answering the general statement that we have retrograded since 1834. In 1847 the number of lashes to be inflicted in any case was reduced to fifty, and no more than fifty can now be awarded for any offence whatever; and this has been the case for the last twenty years and upwards. This is a third answer to the alleged retrogression since 1834. The hon. Gentleman has spoken of courts martials being composed of young officers, leading the House to infer that punishments are awarded in a reckless way. But there can be no court martial that does not require confirmation. Every sentence is submitted to superior authority. A sentence of a general court martial is submitted to the Sovereign, and the Sovereign acts under the advice of the Judge Advocate General; a sentence of a district court martial is submitted to the confirmation of the General Officer commanding the district; a sentence of a regimental court martial undergoes the double revision—first of the Commander of the regiment, and secondly of the General Officer commanding the district. The hon. Member has alluded to one case of flogging that occurred in 1865, which in a Return of corporal punishments was said to have been inflicted for "miscellaneous" offences. I really do not know who compiled this Return; but I imagine the explanation would be that the man was convicted of several offences at the same court martial. The case occurred in the East Indies. The hon. Member's Motion is that in time of peace the punishment of flogging should be abolished in the British army under all circumstances. Now, I do not stop to inquire exactly what the hon. Gentleman means by "time of peace." What is "time of peace" at home may not be "time of peace" at New Zealand or at the Cape. We learned yesterday that it is not time of peace in Honduras. May there not be parts of the British Empire at all times where there is not peace? Let me call the hon. Gentleman's attention to this point with respect to these sentences of corporal punishment. A very small proportion after all is inflicted for offences committed at home. The hon. Gentleman has spoken of the Guards. Well, there is an hon. and gallant Friend behind me (Sir Charles Russell) who will be able to state that the amount of corporal punishment inflicted in the Guards is almost nil. [Opposition cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen cheered; but it did not follow that because in a well-disciplined corps in London they could dispense with corporal punishment they could dispense with it also in New Zealand, China, and our distant dependencies. You will find the annual average number of persons flogged during the last three years to be 141. In 1863 the number was 167; in 1864 it was 109; in 1865, 147; so that the average of the 3 years was 141. Well, where is the punishment principally inflicted? You will find at one time a mutiny at Sierra Leone, on which occasion 30 were flogged. At New Zealand a very large proportion of flogging took place. There would be great difficulty in imprisoning offenders in New Zealand; and yet what other punishment than imprisonment could be substituted for the lash? And the same remark applies to India and to China. The majority of these instances are cases, as I have said, relating to distant dependencies, such as New Zealand, the East Indies, and Canada, and in the latter colony the floggings have chiefly taken place for the crime of desertion—there being great temptations for soldiers to pass over the borders into the United States. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Chatham objects to such a punishment being inflicted for desertion, or for drunkenness. I would like therefore clearly to understand what it is that the hon. Gentleman wishes us to do. Does he wish the House to affirm that corporal punishment is to be abolished, or does he wish us to pass an opinion as to the particular class of offences which ought to be punished in that way? My own idea is that the latter is rather a question to be dealt with by those to whose charge the discipline of the army is committed. At present there are offences—such as absence without leave, which are no longer brought under the head of desertion. It is not for this House to decide what class of offences shall or shall not be visited with corporal punishment. According to my own experience the offences for which it is mainly inflicted are thefts from comrades, striking non-commissioned officers, making away with necessities, desertion, and habitual drunkenness; but in the two latter cases this punishment is rare. I speak only from my official experience of a few years; but comparing the years 1858-9 with 1866-7, I find that in the latter years the courts martial are more loth to inflict it than they were in the former, and that it is only in the most flagrant cases that the presiding officer is willing to inflict the punishment. ["Oh, oh!"] There can be no doubt whatever that flogging is diminishing instead of increasing, and that those who administer the discipline of the army are slow to take advantage of the powers which the law gives them. There is a growing indisposition on the part of officers to resort to such a measure, and that, coupled with the facts I have already brought under the notice of the House, makes me believe that no case has been made out for intervention in this matter. The hon. Gentleman says it should be restricted within the narrowest limits. With respect to that point, I speak my own sentiments, and I am sure I but echo the opinions of all in this House, that we are perfectly at one with him. His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief and those upon whom depends the administration of discipline in the army also earnestly wish to restrict this punishment within the very narrowest possible limits. Upon that point we are all agreed. The hon. Gentleman has referred to the important change introduced by the late Lord Herbert in 1859-60 with regard to the classification of soldiers, and he complains that the orders sanctioned on that occasion have not been complied with. The hon. Gentleman having appealed to me in the matter, I feel bound in all candour to tell him all that I know with respect to it. It is well known to the House that by means of Lord Herbert's classification, soldiers upon entering the army are placed in what is called the first class, and so long as they continue in that class they are protected from being subjected to corporal punishment. It has been urged by the hon. Gentleman that this immunity has been violated, and that a soldier belonging to the first class had actually been subjected to the lash. That is perfectly correct. In the course of last autumn it was my duty to read the proceedings of a court martial, from which I found that a soldier of the first class had been sentenced to corporal punishment. My attention was immediately directed to the case, and I may add that it was one of so detestable and abominable a character that were the facts disclosed I am sure every Member of this House would agree that the punishment was fully merited. In that case the principle laid down in Lord Herbert's classification was certainly violated; a soldier belonging to the first class had corporal chastisement inflicted upon him, but it occurred under what were very exceptional circumstances. I felt it my duty, however, to write to the confirming officer, and to point out to him that, as a pledge had been given to Parliament in the year 1860 that soldiers of that class should possess an immunity from such sentences, those to whom the duty of administering discipline in the army should keep faith with Parliament and carry out the regulations which the Queen had sanctioned. I also addressed a communication on the subject to the Secretary of State for War and his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief; and the result has been that in future the provision applicable to the cases of soldiers of the first class, instead of forming part as it hitherto has done, of the Queen's Regulation, will form part of the Articles of War, and will thus be imperatively binding on all commanding officers, and absolute protection will in this way be afforded. Passing from that, I may remark that one would really suppose from the way in which the hon. Gentleman has put the question that the only persons in the British dominions who are liable to be flogged are the British soldiers, and that such punishment was reserved for one class of Her Majesty's subjects, and for one alone. Nay, more, the hon. and gallant Member for Lichfield spoke of it as opposed to public opinion. But is this really the case? Is it a fact that corporal punishment is opposed to the public opinion of this country? ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen say "Hear, hear!" but I should like us to be explicit upon this matter. The question has been put to the House over and over again for the past twenty-five years, and it has always been answered in the same way. And in what way has it been answered, let me ask? I am speaking now, of course, of civil offences. What happened twenty-five years ago? Why, in the year 1842 this nation was shocked by a succession of impotent and unmeaning outrages against its Sovereign, and it being strongly felt that the cases could not be treated as high treason, a special Act of Parliament was passed providing that this crime should be visited with corporal punishment. The result of that has been that since then there has not been a single instance of personal outrage against the Sovereign. What happened somewhat later? A senseless and miserable man entered the British Museum and wantonly destroyed a beautiful work of art—the Portland Vase—then Parliament felt that the outrage was so gross, and that it gave evidence of such a brutal and degraded nature, that corporal chastisement was really the only punishment which could be inflicted. Again, in the year 1861, when we had the whole of our criminal law under review, Bills were introduced with the greatest deliberation by the Attorney General of the day, submitted to a Select Committee upstairs, and discussed there week after week, and were passed by the House sanctioning the infliction of corporal punishment on offenders not over sixteen years of age. Again, in 1862, Parliament passed an Act especially to regulate the mode in which juvenile and other offenders should be whipped, and prescribing the mode in which they should be whipped in England as well as the way in which the punishment should be inflicted in Scotland. ["Oh, oh!"] I have not the Act by me; but any hon. Member can refer to it for himself. It is a short Act of two clauses, prescribing the mode in which the whipping of juvenile and other offenders should be carried out. But there are even stronger instances in favour of my argument than those which I have already adduced. Four years ago, when garrotting was very prevalent, and when an hon. Member of that House was unable to proceed to his home in safety at night, a special law was passed making violent outrages of that description liable to corporal punishment. That measure was carried on the Motion of my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary for the Colonies (Mr. Adderley), then a private Member of the House, without the weight which attached to a Member of the Government, and solely relying on the preponderating public opinion out of doors. But Parliament has done more. The hon. Member for Chatham complains of the brutal system of corporal punishment in the army, which consists in the administration of fifty lashes. Does he forget that in 1863 the Legislature provided that garroters might be whipped not only once or twice, but three times? [Mr. Buxton: How many lashes?] I will tell the hon. Gentleman. If the person on whom they are inflicted happens not to be over sixteen years of age the number of lashes prescribed is twenty-five each whipping—that was to say, seventy-five if the three whippings are inflicted, as against fifty in the case of the soldier. Any male offender over sixteen may, however, receive fifty lashes at each whipping, or 150 in the whole, while that brutal punishment—the relic, as the hon. Gentleman would have it, of an obsolete age, is maintained in the army only to the extent of fifty lashes for a single offence. I have, I think, said sufficient to show that there is but little force in the argument that corporal punishment is opposed to public opinion; and, when it is borne in mind that only one out of every 400 soldiers is now flogged, and that the lash is not carried to such an extent as to shock the general feeling, I think I am justified in appealing to hon. Members not to interfere with those who are responsible for the discipline of the army, and whose business it is to maintain that army in a state of efficiency, by passing a Resolution couched in such general terms as that under discussion, and which will, if passed, operate in all parts of the world and under all circumstances, however difficult or inexpedient it might be to act upon the suggestion which it contains.

Mr. Mowbray

CAPTAIN VIVIAN said, he thought that the speech of the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down (Mr. Mowbray) furnished the best arguments—if any arguments were required to show the propriety of abolishing corporal punishment in the army—in favour of the Resolution of his hon. Friend the Member for Chatham. The right hon. Gentleman began his speech by putting on that Resolution a construction which the words did not bear, and had argued that Motions of the same character had been brought before the House on various occasions, always to meet with the same fate. The present was, however, he (Captain Vivian) believed, the only occasion on which such a Resolution had been submitted to the House in a substantive form. In all previous cases it had been introduced in Committee by way of Amendment to one of the clauses of the Mutiny Bill. The Motion on the present occasion would therefore have more force than it could previously have had. The right hon. Gentleman went on to charge his hon. Friend with stating that the question of flogging in the army had gone back within the last thirty years, but what he really said was that the class of offences for which that punishment was inflicted had retrograded. He was, however, glad that the right hon. Gentleman had misinterpreted the words used by his hon. Friend, because upon that misinterpretation he hung an argument which was one of the best that could be advanced in favour of the abolition of corporal punishment; for surely, if the cases in which that punishment was now inflicted were only as one in 400, whereas thirty years ago they were one in 137, it was clear that the discipline of the army had gone on rapidly improving without the aid of a brutal and barbarous practice. The right hon. Gentleman the Judge Advocate General had referred to the fact that a gallant Officer in that House had witnessed the infliction of 999 lashes. It had been his (Captain Vivian's) misfortune to have witnessed the infliction, under the sentence of a general court martial, of 200 lashes; but now only fifty lashes could be given, which, in his opinion, proved that the army got on just as well without this brutal and barbarous practice as it did when the larger number were inflicted. The Guards had been instanced by the right hon. Gentleman as a regiment in which corporal punishment was rarely, if ever, inflicted, and he gave as a reason their good discipline, arising from their being in London; but every one connected with the army knew that London was the worst place in all the world where they could enforce discipline. If that could be done with regard to the Guards, who were stationed in London, why could not the discipline of the whole of the army be maintained without corporal punishment? The Household Cavalry regiments had been quoted to show that corporal punishment was not required to enforce discipline; but that was owing to the fact that it was considered the greatest disgrace that could happen to a man to be turned out of the regiment. They should, therefore, endeavour to teach the whole of the army that it was a glory to belong to the profession, and a disgrace to be driven from it. There was no gentler nature or kinder man than His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, and he knew that His Royal Highness would be glad to see corporal punishment abolished if he could, and he only wanted the sanction of the House for it. ["Hear, hear!"] He understood that cheer; but he had no doubt that if the Resolution was adopted by the House the discipline of the army would be quite as safe as it was now. The right hon. Gentleman had compared the British soldiers to felons, because he had urged that public opinion was in favour of the lash in the case of garroters, those who committed high treason by firing at the Queen, men who wilfully destroyed property, as in the case of the Portland Vase, and also in the case of juvenile offenders; but it was precisely because it was so that the punishment lowered the moral standard of the army, and rendered it so difficult to get recruits of a character different from those who now enlisted. But he (Captain Vivian) wished to see the British soldier stand on a different footing. The Secretary of State for War had introduced a new system of recruiting, which no doubt would bring a greater number of recruits to the ranks; but he (Captain Vivian) wished to see a different class enlisted. Nothing prevented a man of respectable family from joining the army so much as the fact that he might be subjected to the lash, and it was therefore only natural that a mother should say to her son, "Don't go where you may be disgraced by the application of the lash." Flogging was not brutal as it was now carried out. A case had been referred to in which a man who had received punishment was supposed to have died in consequence; but from the report of the inquest on Private Symes, of the 74th Highlanders, who died in the Limerick Military Hospital, after receiving fifty lashes, it appeared that the military medical men said he died of erysipelas of the brain, independent of the flogging, while a civil doctor attributed death to irritant fever, consequent on the flogging; and the verdict was that he died from congestion of the brain and fever, accelerated by corporal punishment. It was not proved, then, that he died from corporal punishment, and the probability was that he died from disease, induced by intemperate habits. But in this case the sympathy of the public was in favour of the victim. One of the strongest reasons he had to urge against the continuance of corporal punishment was that it was now administered with such mildness that it had ceased to have any deterrent effect; and that was proved by the Return already quoted, which showed that of 328 men flogged, only six were reclaimed by the flogging. Formerly, when men received 500, or even 999 lashes, it had a different effect, because men's minds were struck with terror. Now, however, it was not the abuse of the lash, but the use of it, that was objected to. It did not deter the really bad from committing crimes, and yet it degraded the army. He sympathized not with the rascal and the ruffian, but with the good soldiers, who were obliged to witness this degrading punishment, knowing that at any moment whilst he wore the Queen's uniform he was liable to it. ["No, no!"] The right hon. Gentleman had admitted that men of the first class had received the lash; the public did not understand the distinction of classes, and the whole army was lowered by the infliction of the punishment. He could not understand the process of reasoning by which it was inferred that if flogging were abolished resort must be had to capital punishment. It was not so in other countries; and the proper punishment of the soldier was that inflicted upon other persons who committed crimes—namely, useful hard labour, and not the dragging of shot and shell. If the Resolution were carried, something must be done to strengthen the hands of commanding officers, and facilitate their getting rid of bad characters, and it might be easily done. The other day he was conversing with a gallant friend who commands one of the most distinguished regiments, and that officer said he would be glad to see flogging abolished if power were given to commanding officers to get rid of bad characters. At present it was impossible for an officer to get rid of a bad character unless he was branded—that was marked, painlessly, with the letters "B. C." He had received a letter from a commanding officer, who said—

Captain Vivian

"About the year 1863 a man enlisted in the regiment named James —, a quietly contumacious and mutinous blackguard. He soon proved himself, never doing his punishment, and always absenting himself. On the occasion of one of his long absences I caused his kit to be examined, and there discovered a 'branded' discharge, purporting to be that of 'James —,' who had been drummed out of the Royal Marines as a notoriously bad and incorrigible character. On his return (he was apprehended soon after) he acknowledged the fact. I wrote to the Admiralty, complaining that this man had not been marked 'B. C.,' and had thus re-enlisted. I received as an answer that they were 'not in the habit of marking men discharged with ignominy.' I then applied to the Adjutant General for leave to discharge him, as a man unfit for the Marines was evidently unfit for any other regiment. The reply was 'You must wait till he further commits himself, then try him, and brand him; but till then he cannot be discharged, as he would again enlist.' I humbly submit that it is Her Majesty's gracious prerogative to discharge any man she pleases. The Household Cavalry have the power, and until the hands of commanding officers are strengthened, we cannot do without the example of flogging, which, however little it may benefit notorious offenders, has a most wholesome effect (by the terror it inspires) upon the young soldier."

I will mention another case—that of a man guilty of a horrible offence. A true bill was found; but, on his trial, the counsel pleaded that the indictment was faulty, inasmuch as the offence was not committed on the Queen's highway as stated, but in a passage three yards away. This man was returned (legally innocent) to his regiment, who have him still, inasmuch as a discharge was refused because the man was not branded. How can commanding officers ameliorate the condition of the soldiers, when recruits are thrown into the society and companionship of such men? If the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the War Department would inaugurate his reign there by abolishing the cruel and useless punishment of flogging, and by enabling commanding officers to get rid of bad characters, he would do more to raise the moral standard of the army, and bring recruits into the service, than could be done by any other system that could be adopted. He wished to see the moral standard of the army made equal to the moral standard of other classes of society. He was quite sure that if the right hon. Gentleman the present Secretary of War brought his abilities unbiassed to bear on this question of flogging, and if he adopted the present Resolution, he would do more for the condition of the soldier than could be effected by any other means.

COLONEL PERCY HERBERT said, he cordially agreed with the hon. and gallant Member (Captain Vivian) that the Commander-in-Chief would be very glad to dispense with corporal punishment in the army if he could; but as it had been said that his Royal Highness would consider his hands strengthened if the present Resolution were passed, probably the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War would be able to inform the House that the Commander-in-Chief was not of that opinion, but would, on the contrary, think that the passing of the Resolution would very much derogate from his power of carrying on the discipline of the army. His right hon. Friend the Judge Advocate had gone so very fully into the subject that he (Colonel Herbert) would not do more than state a few facts. According to a Return which he had seen, it appeared that out of 187,000 and odd men comprised in the Returns of the Army, 170,000, or 91 per cent, were in the first class, and therefore not liable to be flogged, and only 17,000 were liable to that punishment. The hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway) must have fallen into an error when he referred to the flogging of a recruit for desertion, because a recruit must commit a great crime to be put in the second class, where he would be liable to be flogged. The hon. Member also referred to the case of a soldier being flogged for drunkenness, and gave a sensational description of the different punishment inflicted on the officer for the same offence. The House, however, should bear in mind that a soldier was not flogged for a simple act of drunkenness, but only for habitual drunkenness; and, therefore, the comparison of the case of the officer was hardly a fair one to put before the House. He thought that the House would be prepared to admit that if the punishment of fifty lashes was allowed to be given for a great variety of offences in civil life, the punishment of flogging in the army, if it were to be inflicted at all, was not excessive; and in reference to the case which had been alluded to of loss of life having ensued on flogging, he apprehended that it was owing to some accidental circumstance that the man's days were shortened. There was no punishment, not excepting imprisonment, that did not place a man's life more or less in danger, and tend to shorten it. Some stress had been laid on the efficiency of other punishments, and admitting, as he did, that they were efficient, he asked how could they be carried out unless enforced by the dread of corporal punishment? There was an old story that when some one was pressing the Duke of Wellington on this subject of preventing crime in the army by other punishments besides flogging, and suggesting that the offenders might be sent to drill, the noble Duke observed, "Suppose they won't go to drill?" It was not to be denied that a system of other punishments could not be carried out unless there was behind the ultimate terror of corporal punishment. The Resolution expressed an opinion in favour of the abolition of flogging in time of peace, and disclaimed the idea of getting rid of it in time of war, when the soldiers had to undergo the severest hardships and privations. But if, in accordance with such Resolution, flogging happened to be discontinued for ten or twenty years, how would it be possible afterwards, on the occurrence of a war, to resort to that punishment again? Upon this point he would read to the House a statement made before a Commission of Inquiry by the Duke of Wellington. The noble Duke said—

Colonel Percy Herbert

"It would be a very unfortunate circumstance if a punishment pronounced by the Government and Parliament to be an improper punishment should be inflicted on those who are to perform the service abroad, which it has been the object and duty of those at the head of the army to represent as a service of honour and advantage.

... If it (going abroad) was to be attended by corporal punishment being revived—having been put down in England and Ireland—I do not mean to say that there might not be some instances of mutiny and difficulty in getting the soldier abroad, from the fear of having, or under the pretext of the fear of having, this punishment inflicted."

The Duke of Wellington also expressed an opinion that if corporal punishment were discontinued it would not be possible to enforce the minor punishments. Now, these remarks applied much more strongly to soldiers on active service. When he was on service in India it was his fate to have to bring to court martial and to confirm the sentences of corporal punishment on three men in the course of one morning. Two of those men were guilty of having been found asleep while on their posts as sentries on an outpost, with a large number of the enemy in front of them. The other man had committed a deliberate murder of a native, who had been given into his charge as a prisoner. He had put him in charge of a rearguard, whom he had told to take care of the man; but he had hardly ridden away from them the length of that House when he heard the discharge of a musket, and on turning back found the prisoner lying dead. Seeing the man's musket smoking, he made a prisoner of him, and tried to get evidence on the spot; but he found there was a disposition to screen the offender on the part of his comrades. However, he managed to get evidence sufficient to bring the man before a court martial. Now, he would ask the House to consider whether, as he had not power to hang the man, it would have wished such a crime to have been dealt with in a more lenient way than by corporal punishment? In order to show that he was not of a barbarous or cruel disposition, he might mention that on the very same day he remitted half the amount of punishment awarded to the two other men, and apologized to the regiment for having to inflict the same punishment on them as was inflicted on the man who had committed the murder. Now, what was the course pursued in the French army in regard to crimes of violence? A case occurred in the neighbourhood of the English army in front of Sebastopol. A soldier struck an officer ; though, as far as he was aware, there was no pretence that the soldier had any design on the officer's life. Now, according to the French code the penalty for the offence was death. The officer commanding the troops halted on the spot, sent a message to his superior officer, obtained authority to hold a court martial, tried the man, found him guilty, dug his grave, shot him, and marched home. Now, he would ask the House whether, in the interests of humanity, did they wish punishments of this kind to be inflicted in the English army? He had no hesitation in saying that in the English army a similar crime would have only led to corporal punishment, and that the discipline of the English army would have been thereby fully and entirely sustained. It was certainly true that some officers of very high character entertained an objection to flogging, and said they could do without it. Now, no doubt, it was not very difficult for individual officers to take that line under ordinary circumstances; yet their men well knew, if driven into a corner, they would change their minds and resort to it. Moreover, it must be remembered that officers were always enthusiastic about their own regiments, and their opinions must therefore be accepted cum grano salis when they said that their own corps could do without that which was found necessary under other circumstances by other people. The confidence which some officers had in the honour and good behaviour of their men was a part of that esprit de corps of which exaggerated instances were sometimes seen. On this point he might refer to the case of officers of the Bengal army, who after the commencement of the Mutiny were still convinced that their own regiments were still faithful, and would never turn against them. That example showed conclusively that officers were sometimes carried away by their esprit de corps. Now, as corporal punishment was under the present system moderate in amount, as it was only resorted to when serious offences had been committed, as it was effective for the repression of crime, and as without it it would be impossible—especially in time of war—to maintain the discipline of the army unless recourse were had to the more severe punishment of death, he thought he had made out to the satisfaction of the House that there were good grounds why Her Majesty's Government should resist the Motion of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. OSBORNE: The right hon. Gentleman the Treasurer of the Household—[Colonel PERCY HERBERT: Not "right honourable."] Well, you ought to be right honourable. I will say, then, the hon. Gentleman has somewhat misapprehended the Motion of the hon. Member for Chatham, which is for doing away with the punishment of flogging in the army during the time of peace; whereas the anecdotes so graphically narrated by the hon. and gallant Officer referred entirely to a state of war. He has given us anecdotes of his own personal experience in the Crimea, where he so much distinguished himself, and at Sebastopol, where he also distinguished himself; but his distinctions have been gained in the field of war, and his experience does not apply to a time of peace. But the hon. and gallant Officer, following the lead of the Judge Advocate, attempted to deter the House from dealing with this question by saying it would be an interference with the discipline of the army. But ever since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, that has always been the argument of all Judge Advocates, and if it had held good in this House we should have had the same state of things in 1867 as existed in 1812, when any number of lashes might have been inflicted by a district, regimental, or general courts martial. I ask, what has been the cause of the great amelioration, not only in our criminal code, but in the army, if it has not been the influence of this House? Before 1830 there was a punishment in the army of attaching an enormous weight to a soldier's leg. It was proposed to abolish that mode of punishment; and the Judge Advocate of that day, and no doubt the Treasurer of the Household of that day, said then as now—no; that would be interfering with the discipline of the army. But in 1830 a Commission sat; Lord Hill was examined before it, and he said that the punishment was more fit for a beast than a man; and that punishment was abolished altogether. When I heard my hon. and gallant Friend below me describe this punishment as being now tolerably mild, I could not help remembering the lines of Pope—

"Narcissa's nature, tolerably mild,

To make a wash would hardly stew a child."

The hon. Gentleman on the other side is also of opinion that the punishment is excessively moderate; but how has it been reduced to that moderation but by the interference of this House. Prior to 1832

there was no limitation to the number of lashes that might be given by regimental, district, or other courts martial; and a most serious thing happened in 1833, when the same language as we have just heard was held by the Judge Advocate of that day. In that year a clause was moved by Mr. Hume to be inserted in the Mutiny Act absolutely forbidding the punishment of flogging in the army. The division was a very narrow one, and the Motion was only lost by eleven votes—there being 140 for it, and 151 against it. But what happened immediately in consequence of that narrow majority? The punishment was restricted to certain offences, and cut down from 500 to 300 lashes; and so it has been always going on. When the House interfered military men always got up and said, you should not interfere with the British army. I made a Motion in 1843 that the punishment be restricted to fifty lashes. Of course, I was told that it would interfere with the discipline of the army. But what followed in 1845? The Minister for War came down, and on his proposition the punishment was restricted to fifty lashes. What is the argument of the Judge Advocate at the present time? Why, Sir, I was a little ashamed of the speech coming from a man of his official dignity and position; and I thought that if that speech were published side by side with your new army recruiting regulations, that what you gained by your extra 2d. a day you would lose by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman compared the British soldier to a felon, and almost spoke as if he were the flogging master at Eton, or an amateur at flogging. He seemed to say, Is not this a fine national punishment? What do you do with your garrotters? And then he turned round and attempted to apply his great garrotting argument to the recruits of the British army. I was astonished. He thought possibly that he was making rather a smart defence for the punishment of flogging. I thought how it would probably tell in the city of Durham to-morrow morning, and how much more it would tell in the British army. I say if we are ever to have any improvement in anything in this country it will never be done by the mere authorities, whether they be a Royal Highness unnecessarily dragged into this discussion, or any one else; it will never be done until it is effected by the common sense and good feeling of this House. I heard with great satisfaction the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway), who has served as an officer of the army in several quarters of the globe, make a most excellent speech, in which he displayed the mind of a statesman as well as the humanity of a man. I see now many Gentlemen who were not in the House when that speech was made—they are probably rushing in to vote that they will not interfere with the discipline of the British army. But I hope that, at any rate, we shall find that there are men in this House who will not be deterred by these hobgoblin arguments. There is one right hon. Gentleman in this House who has rather gained a fame for re-construction. He was about to re-construct the British navy some time ago, and the other day he was about to re-construct the Board of Admiralty; but somehow or other he failed in both—at least, he has not done either—and now, like an Admirable Crichton, fit for any office, he is removed to the War Office. Well, let him now make a re-construction there, and the first thing he does, let him re-construct the system of punishment in the British army. Let him take my word for it, that if he wishes the army to be well disciplined and well recruited he will remove this abominable punishment from the page of our criminal code in the army, and then he will get a better class of men, and give satisfaction not only to the army but to the country at large.

Mr. Osborne

SIR CHARLES RUSSELL thought the right hon. and gallant General who brought forward the Army Estimates the other evening gave a convincing proof of the most effectual mode of stimulating recruiting for the army by practically improving the condition of the soldier; for no sooner was a little addition made to his pay than the recruiting for the quarter was in excess of the demand, and even time-expired men, who know the necessity of maintaining discipline, were re-entering the ranks because they knew that some ameliorations of a practical character were about to be effected on their behalf. The hon. and gallant Member who last spoke (Mr. Osborne) had congratulated his hon. and gallant Friend the Treasurer of the Household on having told some very graphic anecdotes; but he found fault with them on the score of their applying to a time of war rather than a time of peace. Now, he (Sir Charles Russell) also would tell the House two anecdotes, and they should be both confined to a period of peace, and which showed how deterrent this punishment was. In 1846 he was put on board an old hulk called the Cornwall in which there were many draughts going to the Cape, Mauritius, Ceylon, and China. The officers had never been together before, and the men were entirely recruits. They had not been long at sea when there were serious exhibitions of a mutinous spirit. The non-commissioned officers told the officers that the men in their hammocks were discussing how they could seize the vessel, and that a rising had been determined on. Preparations were made by getting together the most trustworthy of the men in a sort of band for protection, and they were told in the event of anything like a mutinous spirit exhibiting itself to rush to the poop. They did so when a man was haranguing his comrades, telling them that if they would only cut their officers' throats and seize the ship he would lead them; that he knew the use of the quadrant and would take the vessel into a port. The man was tried then and there—he himself was a member of the court martial; there was a difficulty with respect to drummers, for there were none on board; but Colonel Erskine, who commanded, was determined the punishment should be inflicted. The man received corporal punishment before all on the deck; and from that instant, though much anxiety prevailed, every mutinous symptom vanished, and they arrived at the Cape without a single syllable of discontent. That was during peace. The hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) appealed to him, pointing to the Guards, and asked why they got on so admirably? When Colonel Hamilton commanded his battalion there were a series of violent assaults made on the non-commissioned officers in the execution of their duty. He tried every punishment; but these failing, he assembled the men and told them if there was any repetition of the offence he should have a sufficient number of officers kept in barracks to form a court martial; he should have the offenders tried on the spot, and they knew what that meant. Next day a soldier, a very good man, knocked down a non-commissioned officer; he was tried by court martial, and, although all regretted that he should be the subject of the example, he was flogged, and from that instant the offence ceased. It was no argument against the punishment to say that because a soldier was flogged twice it was ineffectual. It was not to punish an individual but to preserve the discipline of the army. And if they stamped out offences against discipline by vigorous means they often prevented more serious offences arising. He would relate an anecdote of a case in time of war. At the Crimea he saw a French soldier taken prisoner for striking his superior officer, and on asking the serjeant in charge of the man what would be done with him, he said that which being literally translated was—"We will whiten his face over with lead to-morrow morning;" and he afterwards found the man was shot. No one would exert himself more than he would to benefit the soldier, but it was the good soldier he spoke of; and if they referred to the evidence before the Recruiting Commission they would find that the good soldiers did not object to this punishment. He would add that in company courts martial soldiers were flogged. He would join in limiting flogging as much as possible; but if they sent officers to distant stations, and did not allow some means short of death by which they might check mutiny and other outrageous misconduct, they would materially interfere with the discipline of the army without benefiting the soldier one iota.

CAPTAIN GROSVENOR said, they had been favoured recently with the views of Her Majesty's Government on the whole question of military organization, but the question of flogging remained just where it was before, though it eminently demanded solution; and he quite agreed with the hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) that the success of this Motion would materially tend to facilitate the solution of the problem, and therefore he must tender his thanks to the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway) for bringing the subject at such a time under the consideration of the House. After the expression of opinion by so many Members—he would not say on both sides of the House, but of various political complexions—he thought there was fair reason to hope that, at least within the limits described, civilization would no longer be disgraced by the use of a punishment which, if it could find justification at all, must seek it in urgent and paramount necessity. It was to him a matter of genuine wonder that a system so justly held in abhorrence should have shown such tenacity of existence. There were some persons who thought that officers viewed the application of the lash with indifference or with positive satisfaction. It was impossible to make a greater mistake.

No calumny could be greater. Yet, when the practice was attacked, officers were always found to defend it despite their personal feelings, and because they would not shrink from the enforcement of what they deemed due to discipline. He had had the honour of serving thirteen years in a regiment in which he was happy to say the lash was unknown; and in the brigade of which that regiment formed a part there was less crime than in any other of the service. Hon. Gentlemen argued that the Household Cavalry did not come fairly in comparison with other regiments, because there were certain inducements which secured for that cavalry a better class of men. He maintained that the most powerful of those inducements was the absence of the lash. There was another case particularly apposite just now. He alluded to that of the Irish police—a most gallant body, 12,000 strong. There was no flogging in that force, and yet no one would allege that there was not good discipline in the Irish police. He concurred with his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) in what he had said upon this point. Years ago there were persons who said that if the tortures then in vogue were done away with discipline would suffer. 300 lashes were then inflicted for, he would not say trivial, but certainly for ordinary offences. Well, the number of lashes had been very considerably diminished; and yet discipline in the British army remained pretty much what it was when that severe punishment was held to be necessary for its maintenance. The opponents of this Motion took their stand on the cases of a certain body of hardened, incorrigible offenders, and contended that on their account the lash must be continued. But he ventured to ask whether a demoralizing punishment, which had been inefficacious either in deterring or improving, ought to be maintained throughout a regiment merely on account of a few hardened and incorrigible offenders. It must be very gratifying to every one to see wicked persons turn over a new leaf; but he very much questioned whether any hon. Gentleman had ever heard of a case in which a reformed culprit, looking back on his career, dated his conversion from the hard, incisive, and deliberate infliction of the cat-o'-nine-tails on his own person. The duty of officers was at times very difficult, and that there was much crime, insubordination, and drunkenness in our army nobody could deny; but the remedy must be sought in other means than the lash. Why was it that those disorders existed in the ranks? It might be partially accounted for when they bore in mind the classes of the people from whom the offenders were originally drawn and the "haphazard" way in which they were drafted. As an onward step in our national civilization he hoped the House would affirm the Motion; and that they would affirm it as a step towards making the military service more palatable to the nation at large. In supporting that Motion he felt that he was but exercising his duty towards his constituents, and likewise that he was consulting the best interests of the profession with which he, in common with many hon. Gentlemen opposite, had the honour of being connected.

Captain Grosvenor

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I am sincerely sorry that the first duty I have to discharge in my new office is to appear as a supporter, to some extent, of corporal punishment, from which, in the abstract, every man on both sides will shrink. In fulfilling the duties of the office which I now fill I shall have to ask the indulgence of the House; but I confess I have less hope than I should otherwise have had of receiving that indulgence after the tone—and, as it appears to me, the uncalled-for tone—in which I have been referred to by the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne). I have never in this House heard a subject discussed which appeared to me to require to be decided more by calm reason, and less by party feeling, than the one now under discussion. It seems to me that in this matter we should be guided solely by the real merits of the case. On the one hand, I do not believe there is any man in this House who does not hold it to be necessary that the discipline of the army should be maintained. I am sure the hon. Member for Chatham (Mr. Otway) is of that opinion. On the other hand, I am convinced there is no Member of this House who would not be glad to get rid of corporal punishment if we could do so with a due regard to that discipline. In coming to a decision on the proposition of the hon. Member for Chatham, the sole question we have to consider is whether, looking at all the facts of the case, we can afford to get rid of the comparatively small remnant of corporal punishment still inflicted in the British army. Now, it appears to me that in discussing this matter the hon. Member for Chatham and the hon. Gentlemen who have supported him have not sufficiently borne in mind the important alteration effected in 1861 by the division of the army into two classes, the first of which classes is entirely exempted from corporal punishment, except only for mutinous conduct. It is otherwise only in the second class that punishment can be inflicted, and even in this case it is so guarded that it can only be inflicted for gross and serious offences. I heard with some surprise from the hon. Member for Chatham that this distinction between the two classes has not always been adhered to. I heard with some surprise that there had been a case in which it was not observed. [An hon. MEMBER: Several cases.] I am very sorry to hear it. I beg to say that I, for one, can be no party to any such deviation from the general rule. I can be no party to a double code; and hon. Gentlemen may now be assured that after what has passed this evening, whatever may have been the case heretofore, no instances of the kind can occur again, because in the annual revision of the Articles of War, which will take place before long, the exemption of the first class will be incorporated in the Articles of War. The hon. Gentleman in his speech made use of an argument which was a rather dangerous one for him to touch on. He alluded to the military codes of France and Prussia. He said that in France corporal punishment was not known, and that the same was the case in Prussia. But I very much doubt whether the British soldier would exchange our military code for either that of France or of Prussia. For offences which in our service render the British soldier liable to be flogged, the French or the Prussian soldier would be shot or sentenced to a long term of imprisonment; and though in the military service of those countries there may be no corporal punishment, yet their codes are so severe that the change might seem merciful. The hon. Gentleman also, I think, referred to the military code of the United States. In that code corporal punishment by flogging is not included; but in the United States they have a punishment called the "ball and chain," which I am told inflicts severer corporal suffering. There, again, the exchange would be a very bad one for the British soldier. Then in Austria, where corporal punishment is not unknown, they have a system under which the wrist and ankle are chained together, a punishment by which great torture is inflicted. The hon. and gallant Member for Truro (Captain Vivian) referred to the opinion of the Commander-in-Chief. I am sure he only does justice to the kind disposition of the illustrious Duke, and that his Royal Highness would be delighted to see an end of corporal punishment in the army if that were possible. But I am sorry to say that in the present view of his Royal Highness the system cannot be entirely abolished. The right hon. and gallant Member for Huntingdon (General Peel), my predecessor in the office I have the honour to hold, with the view to meet the Motion of the hon. Member for Chatham, wrote a letter to his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, in which he expressed his deep sense of the importance of the question about to be brought before the House, and expressed his desire that his Royal Highness would inform him of the opinion he held upon this question. I am authorized by his Royal Highness to read to the House extracts from the letter he wrote in reply to the right hon. Gentleman. His Royal Highness says—

"Within the last few years a great change has taken place in the regulations which govern the infliction of corporal punishment, and the only crimes for which it can be awarded are of a very flagrant and disgraceful nature. . . . The very general opinion among those who command or have commanded regiments is that it cannot be dispensed with; and, under these circumstances, I desire to state that although no one can be more opposed than myself to the exercise of the power of carrying into execution sentences of corporal punishment awarded by courts martial except in very flagrant cases, the abolition of it would, in my opinion, be fraught with extreme danger to the discipline of the army."

That is the deliberate opinion of the Duke of Cambridge. I have also here the opinion of the Adjutant General to the same effect, but I need not detain the House by reading it. Hon. Members must agree with me that, after having received this opinion from these distinguished persons, it would be impossible for me to accede to the Motion of the hon. Member for Chatham. The hon. and gallant Member for Truro has stated, with perfect truth, that I come to this question with an entirely unprejudiced mind. I wish it to be decided solely upon its merits; but I am bound to consider, as the first duty of my position, the preservation of the discipline of the army. The hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Captain Grosvenor) has alluded to the experience afforded by his own regiment—the 1st Life Guards; but I am sure the hon. and gallant Member will forgive me if I remind him that he can hardly compare the mode of preserving discipline in the Household Brigade in this country with that which prevails in other regiments in the army serving in different parts of the world. The hon. and gallant Gentleman will no doubt support me when I say that when a man misbehaves himself in the Household Brigade, and it is considered undesirable to retain him in the regiment, he is at once turned out, and in that case, therefore, there is no occasion to resort to the punishment which we are now discussing. The hon. and gallant Member for Truro has expressed a hope that the recruits for the army will be obtained from an improved class. I sincerely hope that such will be the case; but I must remind him, that even in that case we shall still find that where we have to deal with very large bodies of men assembled under military discipline, however high their general character may be, there will always be among them a certain proportion of inferior and abandoned characters, for whose correction it will be absolutely necessary that some severe punishment should be adopted. I can only say that if on further experience it should be found possible to do away with this particular mode of punishment as unnecessary to maintain the discipline of the army, no one will be better pleased than myself.

MR. FAWCETT said, he felt somewhat nervous in making a few remarks after the somewhat solemn injunction of the right hon. Gentleman to avoid party spirit and to preserve calm reason. He would, however, endeavour to reason as calmly as possible when speaking upon this subject. The right hon. Gentleman said every one must admit the truth of the proposition of the hon. Member for Chatham, considered as an abstract question. In his (Mr. Fawcett's) opinion that admission, unless some strong arguments were brought to bear on the question on the other side, was conclusive that the right hon. Gentleman ought to vote in favour of it. The army was gradually becoming a skilled profession, requiring a skilled soldiery. They required skill to carry on their operations; the greatest mechanical and scientific genius was displayed in perfecting their weapons, and to use those complicated weapons they required men of intelligence to do justice to the genius that devised them. No one who had mixed at all with the class from which the army was recruited could deny that flogging in the army was positively abhorred by the people of England, and that fathers positively entreated their sons not to enter a profession in which they would be subject to such a terrible disgrace. He was not speaking a single word which was not justified by experience when he said that the effect of retaining flogging was to keep the best men in England from entering the army. The statement made by the right hon. Gentleman at the end of his speech was conclusive in favour of the Motion; for he told the House that the men in the Household Brigade felt that it was such a disgrace to be turned out of it that flogging was wholly unnecessary. If the army were properly administered, what was felt in the Household Brigade would be felt throughout every regiment in the British army. The army should be looked upon as the noblest profession a man could enter. They made this pledge to their country—that if the honour or interests of the nation required it they would freely give up their lives to maintain it. When a man did that he ought not to be treated in such a way as was allowed under the existing system, when a dismissal from the profession would be considered by him as the greatest disgrace. Flogging was not required to maintain the discipline of the police force, because the men there considered that a dismissal from it was sufficient disgrace. He was confident that they would never have the army in a proper condition until they gave up this exceptional punishment, which was not necessary to keep up the discipline. If they abolished flogging they would satisfy the wishes of the English people, and thousands would then enter the army (who were now deterred from doing so), because they would look upon it as one of the most honourable professions.

Sir John Pakington

COLONEL NORTH said, it was always painful to him to appear as the advocate of any punishment, particularly of one so degrading as that of flogging in the army; but since he had had the honour of a seat in that House, he felt it his duty, in the interests of the soldiers themselves, to oppose such Motions as that of his hon. Friend. The House, in considering this question, had, he thought, lost sight of the interests of the good soldiers. The problem to solve was, to invent such a punishment as would preserve discipline without diminishing the strength or increasing the duties of the well-conducted soldiers of the regiment. The case of civilians was altogether different, for offenders might be punished by imprisonment, without any injury being done to innocent parties. In the army the duties of the regiment must be performed, and every man taken away from the ranks and committed to prison, occasioned the performance of his duty to be thrown upon the shoulders of the good and efficient soldiers. The hon. Member opposite was wrong in saying that soldiers were liable to be flogged for habitual drunkenness. That punishment could not be inflicted except for drunkenness while on duty or under arms. His hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne), who had spoken so strongly that night, had changed his opinions very considerably since they were in garrison together several years ago. Fault had been found with the system of flogging for desertion; but there was no crime, he thought, that deserved greater punishment than that of desertion. He would mention one instance in which flogging had been administered, and the case was that of a man who had deserted eleven times, and had taken eleven different bounties. A good deal had been said about soldiers being treated like garroters, but there were 91 per cent of the soldiers who could not be flogged, and there was only the remaining 9 per cent who were in the second class, and thus were liable to be flogged; though it did not at all follow that those of this class would be flogged if they committed offences. He wished to remind the House how the soldier was guarded from being flogged. He must first be tried by a court martial consisting of five officers; and even if they awarded the punishment of flogging it could not be carried into effect without the consent of the commanding officer and general of the district, and even then the greatest number of lashes which could be inflicted was fifty. As to civil flogging, it appeared from a Report presented to them last year, that men received fifty and twenty-five lashes for breaking their cell windows, and in another case a man received thirty-six cuts for refusing to read and disrespect to a magistrate in school. He asked whether crimes of these descriptions would be punished by flogging in the army? He (Colonel North) had been held up to obloquy by hon. Gentlemen opposite, for supporting the system of branding, which he believed to have a beneficial effect; and it was most unfair on the part of the Admiralty that they did not carry out the system with regard to Marines who were drummed out of the service. He must say that there was no body of men who would be more grateful to any one who would invent a punishment by which flogging could be got rid of than would officers in command of troops, but till such was forthcoming the flogging system must be maintained. As to the case which had been referred to, in the 74th Highlanders, he thought that it should have been stated that three military medical gentlemen differed from the opinion which had been given as to the cause of death.

CAPTAIN VIVIAN explained that he did not believe that the man in the 74th had been killed by flogging, and he had argued on the assumption that this was not so.

COLONEL NORTH said, his complaint was that the conflict of opinion between the civil doctor and the army medical officers who saw the man in question had not been mentioned.

CAPTAIN HAYTER observed, that many of the statements which had been made in the course of the debate did not apply to this Motion at all; some referred to what occurred in service in the field, and others to what happened at sea; whilst this Motion applied only to time of peace, and to regiments serving on shore. There was one point which had not been referred to, and it was this. In 1846 the Prime Minister, Lord John Russell, with the sanction of the Commander-in-Chief, the Duke of Wellington, introduced the question of the reduction of the punishment of flogging to fifty lashes, and the Duke sanctioned that proposition, and a noble Earl (the Earl of Dalhousie) made a speech, the substance of which was that the punishment would be gradually abolished. A Royal Commission in 1835 had made a recommendation to a similar effect, but still since 1846 nothing had been done. The object of the Motion was not to injure the discipline of the army, but rather that bad men should be altogether eliminated from its ranks, and they only asked that the profession of arms should be placed on the same footing as all other professions. The supporters of the present Motion were speaking on behalf of those who, as a class isolated from society, could have no representatives in Parliament.

GENERAL PEARL: I can easily imagine that it is with great regret my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War finds it necessary, on the first occasion of his performing the duties of that office, to oppose the present Motion. Many arguments and statements have been made in the course of this debate which were well calculated to carry away the feelings of hon. Members. But I rise for the purpose of urging that they should not allow themselves to be carried away by feeling, but should coolly and deliberately consider the grave question now before us. Many arguments have been brought forward in support of this Motion, and I perfectly admit that there is but one argument which can be brought forward in answer; but that one is so conclusive that it must overrule all other arguments—that argument is that the power of inflicting this punishment is absolutely necessary to the maintenance of the discipline of the army. You have heard from my right hon. Friend that His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief and the Adjutant General look upon this punishment as absolutely necessary for the discipline of the army; yet, even the hon. Member who introduced the question, and those who have supported him, would not be more ready to abolish the punishment of flogging than the Commander-in-Chief if it could be done consistently with the maintenance of that discipline for which they are responsible. The position of the hon. Member is, I think, perfectly untenable; he would reserve the punishment of flogging for times of war. I tell you to make up your minds either to abolish it altogether, or to maintain it without exception—who can tell when a war exists? It may exist at this very moment. Only last night a question was asked as to the conduct of the troops at Honduras. I shall not express any opinion on that question until it is investigated; but I believe that the conduct of these troops will subject them to the greatest penalty under the Mutiny Act. Are you going to tell the men who enlist that in time of peace they are not to be subjected to capital punishments, but that they are to be flogged when in face of the enemy? If you say that, you condemn your argument altogether. I venture to say that there is no country in which it is more necessary that discipline should be maintained than in England; any irregularity of the troops in this country would be looked upon with the greatest alarm; and depend upon it that, unless an army, however small, is subject to the strictest discipline, it is perfectly intolerable. Thirty years ago a Royal Commission reported strongly, not only in favour of retaining the punishment, but against making any distinction between the service at home and the service abroad.

General Peel

Upon that point no distinction can be made. You enlist a man without a character; if he turn out badly you have no means of discharging him, but you require from him strict obedience, and subject him to a discipline which you could not call upon him to undergo in any other condition of life. In order, then to ensure that obedience, it is absolutely necessary that his commanders should have the power to inflict upon him a punishment which could not be inflicted upon him in any other condition of life. But, although the recruit may be a man of bad character, it is assumed that his character is good, which is a very charitable assumption, if the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) be right; and the man is told that he shall not be subject to flogging until he has so degraded himself that he is passed into the second class, and that even then he will not be flogged until he has, by repeated acts of disobedience, gained for himself the character of being so incorrigible that no other punishment would have any effect. The example of one bad man will affect a whole regiment. And what do you propose to substitute for flogging? Do away with the disgraceful custom of flogging, you say, and good men will come to the service; but I say it is because flogging is a defence of the good man that I would continue it. A man of good character in the army is no more in danger of being flogged than any of us. Would you say to those whom you desire to enter the army, "Here's glorious news for you; you are no longer liable to be flogged—you will be shot instead?" That, I say, is the only substitute you could offer for some of the worst crimes; and, as I am not prepared to take upon myself a responsibility which the Commander-in-Chief and Adjutant General shrink from, I shall vote against the Motion.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that on former occasions he had refrained from voting upon this question, as he felt the heavy responsibility of voting against a majority of military men on a military question; but he had now formed his opinion upon it. As a Member of the Royal Commission on Recruiting for the Army, he had put questions to witnesses as to the effect of flogging upon recruiting, and although the answers told in various ways, he was forced to the conclusion that the punishment of flogging was the great cause of keeping good men out of the army. Why was it, he asked, that the service was looked on with such pride in the upper classes, and with such aversion in the lower classes? He was bound to conclude that flogging was one reason for this. The service was unpopular because of the punishment; and the punishment was needed because the service was unpopular; he appealed to them to strike away the punishment and the unpopularity at the same time. There was no doubt, however, that if flogging were abolished, the commanding officers should have great powers of getting rid of bad men. He desired to explain that the descriptions "refuse" and "drags" which he had used with reference to recruits were not his own, but quotations from the evidence of officers and men before the Commissioners.

MR. DAVENPORT BROMLEY said, he had come to the House resolved to vote against flogging, and he intended doing so still; but he had been almost induced to change his opinion by hearing speeches from the Opposition side of the House in support of it; the remarks of the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Osborne) had been most powerful in their influence in this direction. He would go beyond hon. Members opposite, and would vote for the abolition of the punishment even in time of war. He desired simply to relate one incident which weighed heavily with him. When in the Crimea he had seen a man receive fifty lashes for having thrown down his firelock and run away in the face of the enemy. He had certainly never heard of a case in which the punishment was more disproportionate to the offence.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided :—Ayes 107; Noes 108: Majority 1.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Resolved, That this House, reserving for future consideration when requisite the question of the exigencies of a state of war, is of opinion that it is unnecessary that the punishment of Flogging should be awarded during the time of peace to Soldiers of the Army or Corps of Royal Marines serving on Shore.—(Mr. Otway.)

AYES.

Adderley, rt. hon. C. B.	Beach, W. W. B.
Archdall, Captain M.	Bentinck, G. C.
Bailey, Sir J. R.	Benyon, R.
Barrington, Viscount	Biddulph, M.
Beach, Sir M. H.	Bridges, Sir B. W.

Brooks, R.	Lindsay, Colonel R. L.
Bruce, Sir H. H.	Lowther, J.
Burrell, Sir P.	Malcolm, J. W.
Calcraft, J. H. M.	Manners, rt. hn. Lord J.
Cartwright, Colonel	Montgomery, Sir G.
Cave, rt. hon. S.	Morgan, O.
Chatterton, H. E.	Morris, rt. hon. M.
Clinton, Lord E. P.	Mowbray, rt. hon. J. R.
Clive, Capt. hon. G. W.	Neville-Grenville, R.
Cole, hon. H.	Nicholson, W.
Cole, hon. J. L.	North, Colonel
Curzon, Viscount	O'Neill, E.
Dickson, Major A. G.	Paget, R. H.
Dimsdale, R.	Pakington, rt. hn. Sir J.
Disraeli, rt. hon. B.	Peel, rt. hon. General
Du Cane, C.	Powell, F. S.
Dyott, Colonel R.	Repton, G. W. J.
Earle, R. A.	Ridley, Sir M. W.
Eckersley, N.	Robertson, P. F.
Edwards, Sir H.	Rolt, Sir J.
Egerton, hon. A. F.	Russell, Sir C.
Egerton, E. C.	Schreiber, C.
Egerton, hon. W.	Selwyn, C. J.
Fane, Colonel J. W.	Severne, J. E.
Ferguson, Sir J.	Seymour, G. H.
Floyer, J.	Simonds, W. B.
Forester, rt. hon. Gen.	Smith, A.
Garth, R.	Smollett, P. B.
Gilpin, Colonel	Stanley, Lord
Goldney, G.	Stanley, hon. F.
Gore, J. R. O.	Stirling-Maxwell, Sir W.
Hamilton, Lord C.	Stopford, S. G.
Harvey, R. B.	Surtees, H. E.
Hay, Sir J. C. D.	Sykes, C.
Herbert, hon. Col. P.	Tottenham, Lt.-Col. C. G.
Hervy, Lord A. H. C.	Trevor, Lord A. E. Hill-
Hildyard, T. B. T.	Vance, J.
Hodgson, W. N.	Vandeleur, Colonel
Hogg, Lieut.-Col. J. M.	Verner, E. W.
Hood, Sir A. A.	Walker, Major G. G.
Hunt, G. W.	Walpole, rt. hon. S. H.
Karslake, Sir J. B.	Walrond, J. W.
Karslake, E. K.	Whitmore, H.
Kavanagh, A.	Williams, F. M.
Kendall, N.	Wyndham, hon. P.
King, J. K.	Wywill, M.
King, J. G.
Kingscote, Colonel
Knox, hon. Major S.
Lennox, Lord H. G.
Lindsay, hon. Col. C.

TELLERS.

Taylor, Colonel
Noel, hon. G. J.

NOES.

Akroyd, E.	Childers, H. C. E.
Amberley, Viscount	Cogan, rt. hon. W. H. F.
Ayrton, A. S.	Craufurd, E. H. J.
Baines, E.	Crossley, Sir F.
Barclay, A. C.	Dalglish, R.
Barnes, T.	Denman, hon. G.
Beaumont, H. F.	Dillwyn, L. L.
Blake, J. A.	Eaton, H. W.
Blennerhasset, Sir R.	Edwards, C.
Brady, J.	Eykyn, R.
Bright, Sir C. T.	Fawcett, H.
Briscoe, J. I.	Fordyce, W. D.
Bromley, W. D.	Forster, C.
Bryan, G. L.	Forster, W. E.
Butler, C. S.	Gaskell, J. M.
Buxton, C.	Gavin, Major
Calthorpe, hn. F. H. W. G.	Gilpin, C.
Candlish, J.	Glyn, G. G.
Chambers, M.	Graham, W.

Greville-Nugent, Col.	Pelham, Lord
Gridley, Captain H. G.	Potter, E.
Grosvenor, Capt. R. W.	Potter, T. B.
Hadfield, G.	Power, Sir J.
Hankey, T.	Pugh, D.
Harris, J. D.	Rearden, D. J.
Hartley, J.	Russell, Sir W.
Hayter, Captain A. D.	Scholefield, W.
Henderson, J.	Scott, Sir W.
Herbert, H. A.	Seely, C.
Holden, I.	Seymour, H. D.
Howard, hon. C. W. G.	Sheridan, H. B.
Hughes, T.	Sheriff, A. C.
Hughes, Major	Simeon, Sir J.
Lawson, rt. hon. J. A.	Smith, J. B.
Lechmere, Sir E. A. H.	Stock, O.
Leeman, G.	Stuart, Col. Crichton-
Lefevre, G. J. S.	Stucley, Sir G. S.
Lennox, Lord G. G.	Sullivan, E.
Lusk, A.	Synan, E. J.
MaoEvoy, E.	Taylor, P. A.
M'Laren, D.	Torrans, W. T. M'C.
Marsh, M. H.	Trevelyan, G. O.
Merry, J.	Vanderbyl, P.
Mill, J. S.	Vivian, Capt. hn. J. C. W.
Mitchell, T. A.	Waring, C.
Monk, C. J.	Warner, E.
Murphy, N. D.	Watkin, E. W.
Neate, C.	Whitbread, S.
O'Beirne, J. L.	White, J.
O'Brien, Sir P.	Williamson, Sir H.
O'Connor Don, The	Wyld, J.
O'Donoghue, The	Young, R.
Oliphant, L.
Osborne, R. B.
Pease, J. W.
Peel, A. W.

TELLERS.

Otway, A. J.

Anson, Major

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

Resolved, That this House will immediately resolve itself into the Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Land Forces, Pay, and Allowances, &c., on account	£1,700,000
Commissariat Establishment, Services, and Movement of Troops, on account	400,000
Clothing Establishments, Services and Supplies, on account	150,000
Barraack Establishment, Services, and Supplies, on account	200,000
Divine Service, on account	14,000
Administration of Martial Law, on account	7,000
Hospital Establishment, Services and Supplies, on account	80,000
Disembodied Militia, on account	280,000
Yeomanry Cavalry, on account	28,000
Volunteer Corps, on account	120,000
Enrolled Pensioners and Army Reserve Force, on account	16,000
Manufacturing Departments and Materials for Warlike Stores, on account	360,000
Military Store Establishment and Purchase of Warlike Stores, on account	130,000
Superintending Establishment of, and Expenditure for Works, Buildings, and Repairs, at Home and Abroad, on account	250,000

Military Education, on account	£53,000
Surveys of the United Kingdom, on account	29,000
Miscellaneous Services, on account	49,000
Administration of the Army, on account	74,000
Rewards for Military Service, on account	13,000
Pay of General Officers, on account	36,000
Pay of Reduced and Retired Officers, on account	231,000
Widows' Pensions and Compassionate Allowances, on account	79,000
Pensions and Allowances to Wounded Officers, on account	12,000
Establishments of Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals, and Charge for In-Pensioners, on account	18,000
Out-Pensioners, on account	591,000
Superannuation and Retired Allowances, on account	68,000
Disembodied Militia, Yeomanry Cavalry, and Volunteer Corps, on account	12,000

MR. AYRTON wished to know up to what period these Votes on Account would last?

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON replied that, with one or two exceptions, they were one-third of the total amount of the Army Estimates.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

(28.) £1,000,000, Wages, &c., to Seamen and Marines on account.

MR. AYRTON inquired if this Vote bore the same proportion to the entire Estimates as the former Votes?

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that the total amount was £2,900,000, and the present Vote was on Account. There appeared to be a general agreement in the House last night that, considering the state of business, that Vote might be taken.

Vote agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

That a sum, not exceeding £1,924,000, be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charge of the following Civil Services, to the 31st day of March, 1868:—

Class I.

Royal Palaces	£6,000
Public Buildings	25,000
Furniture of Public Offices	3,000
Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens	25,000
New Houses of Parliament	10,000
New Foreign Office	13,000
Public Offices, Site (Re-Vote)	15,000
Probate Court and Registries (Re-Vote)	8,000
Public Record Repository (Re-Vote)	3,000

1998	Supply—Civil	{MARCH 15, 1867}	Service Estimates.	1994
University of London Buildings ..	£5,000	Common Law Courts, including Crown Office, Queen's Bench ..	£13,000
Chapter House, Westminster ..	3,000	Criminal Proceedings ..	18,000
Sheriff Court Houses, Scotland ..	5,000	Courts of Law and Justice, including Accountant in Bankruptcy, and ..	12,000
Rates for Government Property ..	7,000	Exchequer, Scotland, Legal Branch ..
British Consulate and Embassy Houses, Constantinople ..	1,000	Register House, Edinburgh, Salaries and Expenses of Sundry Departments ..	5,000
Metropolitan Fire Brigade ..	3,000	Law Charges and Criminal Prosecutions ..	12,000
Harbours of Refuge ..	20,000	Court of Chancery ..	2,000
Holyhead and Portpatrick Harbours, &c. ..	8,000	Court of Queen's Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer ..	4,000
Public Buildings, Ireland ..	19,000	Officers of the Judges on Circuit ..	2,000
Ulster Canal ..	2,000	Manor Courts' Compensation ..	1,000
Lighthouses Abroad ..	5,000	Registry of Judgments ..	1,000
Class II.		Registry of Deeds ..	4,000
Two Houses of Parliament, Offices ..	18,000	Court of Bankruptcy and Insolvency ..	2,000
Treasury ..	14,000	Court of Probate ..	3,000
Home Office ..	7,000	Landed Estate Court ..	3,000
Foreign Office ..	16,000	Process Servers, Civil Bill Courts ..	3,000
Colonial Office ..	9,000	Dublin Metropolitan Police and Police Justices ..	13,000
Privy Council Office ..	7,000	Constabulary of Ireland ..	208,000
Board of Trade, &c. ..	9,000	Four Courts Marshalsea Prison ..	1,000
Privy Seal Office ..	1,000	Inspection and General Superintendence ..	5,000
Civil Service Commission ..	3,000	Prisons and Convict Establishments at Home ..	83,000
Paymaster General's Office ..	6,000	Maintenance of Prisoners in County Gaols, &c. and Removal of Convicts ..	72,000
Exchequer and Audit Department ..	10,000	Transportation of Convicts ..	6,000
Office of Works and Public Buildings	9,000	Convict Establishments in the Colonies ..	38,000
Office of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues ..	7,000	Class IV.
Public Record Office ..	6,000	Public Education, Great Britain ..	174,000
Poor Law Commissions ..	25,000	Science and Art Department ..	44,000
Mint, including Coinage ..	12,000	Public Education, Ireland ..	85,000
Inspectors of Factories, Fisheries, &c. ..	10,000	University of London ..	3,000
Exchequer and other Offices in Scotland	2,000	Universities, &c. in Scotland ..	5,000
Household of Lord Lieutenant, Ireland	2,000	Queen's University in Ireland ..	1,000
Chief Secretary, Ireland, Offices ..	4,000	Queen's Colleges, Ireland ..	2,000
Office of Public Works, Ireland ..	7,000	Belfast Theological Professors, &c. ..	1,000
Copyhold, Tithe, and Inclosure Commission ..	6,000	British Museum ..	25,000
Inclosure and Drainage Acts; Imprest Expenses ..	3,000	National Gallery ..	4,000
General Register Offices, England, Ireland, and Scotland ..	17,000	Scientific Works and Experiments ..	2,000
National Debt Office ..	4,000	Board of Manufactures, Scotland ..	1,000
Public Works Loan Commission and West India Relief Commission ..	1,000	Class V.
Lunacy Commissions and Inspection, &c., of Lunatic Asylums ..	4,000	Bermudas ..	1,000
Superintendent of Roads, South Wales	1,000	Clergy, North America ..	1,000
Registrars of Friendly Societies ..	1,000	Governors and others, West Indies, &c. ..	6,000
Charity Commission ..	5,000	Justices, West Indies ..	2,000
Local Government Act Office, and Inspection of Burial Grounds ..	2,000	Western Coast ..	5,000
Landed Estates Record Offices ..	1,000	St. Helena ..	2,000
Quarantine Expenses ..	1,000	Falkland Islands ..	2,000
Secret Service ..	8,000	Labuan ..	1,000
Printing and Stationery ..	90,000	Emigration ..	3,000
Postage of Public Departments ..	38,000	Class VI.
Class III.		Treasury Chest ..	1,000
Law Charges, England ..	9,000	Captured Negroes, Bounties on Slaves, &c. ..	8,000
Criminal Prosecutions, &c. ..	48,000	Commissions for Suppression of Slave Trade ..	3,000
Police, Counties and Boroughs, Great Britain ..	66,000	Consuls Abroad ..	42,000
Admiralty Court Registry ..	4,000	Services in China, Japan, and Siam ..	32,000
Late Insolvent Debtors' Court ..	1,000	Ministers at Foreign Courts, Extraordinary Expenses ..	9,000
Probate Court ..	22,000	Special Missions, Outfits, &c. ..	9,000
County Courts ..	37,000	Third Secretaries to Embassies ..	1,000
Land Registry Office ..	2,000
Police Courts, Metropolis ..	6,000
Metropolitan Police ..	41,000
Bankruptcy Court Compensations ..	4,000

Class VI.

Superannuation and Retired Allowances	£47,000
Polish Refugees and Distressed Spaniards	1,000
Merchant Seamen's Fund Pensions, &c.	14,000
Relief of British Distressed Seamen	8,000
Miscellaneous Charges, formerly on Civil List	1,000
Public Infirmaries, Ireland	1,000
Hospitals in Dublin and Board of Superintendence	4,000
Concordatum Fund, and other Charities and Allowances, Ireland	3,000
Non-Conforming and other Ministers, Ireland	11,000

Class VII.

Temporary Commissions	8,000
Patent Law Expenses	8,000
Fishery Board, Scotland	4,000
Local Dues on Shipping under Treaties of Reciprocity	14,000
Inspectors of Corn Returns	1,000
Household of the late King of the Belgians	1,000
Miscellaneous Expenses from Civil Contingencies	20,000

Total .. £1,924,000

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he should like to know what course the Government proposed to take with regard to the Estimates. Supposing they took money sufficient to last for four months, they might not go into Supply again until that time. He wished to know whether the Secretary for War would bring on the Votes again within any reasonable time, for some opportunities of discussion ought to be afforded.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he might appease the alarm of his hon. Friend by informing him that it was intended to proceed with the Army Estimates on Monday, if there should be sufficient time after the introduction of the Reform Bill.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH thought that would be a most inconvenient time.

Vote agreed to.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported upon Monday next; Committee to sit again upon Monday next.

CHARITABLE DONATIONS AND BEQUESTS (IRELAND) BILL.

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, (Mr. Attorney General for Ireland.)

[BILL 49.] SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. CHATTERTON), in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that it was based upon Resolutions adopted by the Board of Charitable Donations, and it had received the approval of a fully attended meeting of that Board. The Bill differed from that brought in by the hon. Member for Waterford (MR. BLAKE) last year in leaving the constitution of the Board untouched, and in imposing no additional burden upon the Consolidated Fund. The Bill was intended chiefly to remove the difficulties and simplify the procedure in relation to charitable bequests in Ireland. It provided that any trustees of charitable property should have the power of applying for advice from the Board of Trustees, and that the advice obtained would indemnify them from responsibility, provided the application had been free from misrepresentation and fraud. That provision would not, however, prejudice third parties, but would only indemnify the trustees. The Board, too, might, with their own consent, be nominated as trustees of charitable funds. There were other provisions providing for a speedy and economical mode of recovering small bequests, and it was hoped that the Bill would remedy a great many evils connected with the present state of charitable bequests and donations in Ireland.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Friday, 5th April.

MUTINY BILL.

Bill "for punishing Mutiny and Desertion, and for the better Payment of the Army and their Quarters," presented, and read the first time.

House adjourned at half after Twelve o'clock, till Monday next.

APPENDIX.

Speech of the RIGHT HON. C. P. VILLIERS on the Second Reading of the "METROPOLITAN POOR BILL," February 21.

[A Revised Report.]

MR. C. P. VILLIERS: * Sir, I rise to express my concurrence in the sentiments which have fallen from those hon. Gentlemen who have spoken generally in favour of this measure. I coincide entirely in approving of its purpose and its principle. The Bill, if I understand it properly, is meant to provide for the better treatment of the sick poor in the infirmaries of the metropolitan workhouses—an object greatly to be desired, inasmuch as it is proved that in many respects the present system has failed. I look upon the principle on which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gathorne Hardy) proposes to proceed for this purpose as a sound one, as being in conformity with the true principle of the new Poor Law itself, and of that more recent legislation by which the area of charge was extended, and the burden of maintaining the poor distributed over a larger district than the mere locality supposed to be peculiarly liable. That principle of extending the area of charge goes far to touch, in my opinion, as the hon. and learned Member for the Tower Hamlets (Mr. Ayrton) stated the other night, the root of much of the mismanagement which takes place both in town and country. By this means you increase the chance of intelligent management, and you weaken the motive for that kind of local parsimony which is very frequently mistaken economy, and is attended with great mischief to the poor. I have also to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the view he now takes as to the means by which the condition of the sick poor in the metropolis can be improved; and that, profiting by the experience of a few months, he has seen the wisdom of seeking fresh powers from the Legislature, and not relying merely upon the imperfect authority under which he now acts, or engaging at law in unseemly contests with Boards of Guardians.

I felt sure that with his intelligence he would soon perceive the difference between the technical interpretation of the law from which his powers are derived, and its practical application under existing circumstances. I think, moreover, that the right hon. Gentleman is quite right in not losing time in coming to this House for the additional powers which he requires. He has acceded to his post at a time when the feeling of distrust and jealousy of the Central Board which has prevailed ever since the enactment of the Poor Law thirty-two years ago, seems for a while to have subsided. This is, perhaps, the first time since the creation of the Board when a reproach that it had not acted with sufficient rigour would not have been received with ridicule. It is the antagonism which has so often been shown to that Board on the part of the public which has prevented the full development of the law, and which, as the right hon. Gentleman must admit, has rendered it almost impossible to give full effect, until recently, to its provisions. To that same hostile feeling, he must also know, the appointment of the Committee, to which he himself alluded, was to be attributed. That feeling was exhibited peculiarly in 1860, when an application was made for the renewal of the Poor Law Commission. All that had ever been said against the Board was then urged by Members representing important constituencies; and, notwithstanding the appeal which was made by Lord Palmerston, Sir George Lewis, and other distinguished persons, there was a majority against the renewal of the Commission for the usual period, and against the Government, of no less than 3 to 1. The Commission was, indeed, only renewed for a shorter period than was proposed, on the undertaking that a searching inquiry should be instituted into the administration and operation of the Poor Law from the time of its existence. It was at that time, I think, that upwards of 100 memorials, coming from as many unions, were presented to this House, praying that the Board might either be deprived of some of the most important powers which it possessed or discontinued altogether. Thus matters stood in 1860, and in the following year a Committee was appointed to investigate the subject. That Committee did not originate with the Government, but was a Committee insisted upon emphatically by the House itself. There was a most unusual number of Members placed upon that Committee for the purpose of making a searching investigation into the operation of the law; and so strong was my feeling upon that occasion that it was a question as to whether the Board should be continued or not, that I stated to the Committee that it would be improper for the President of the Poor Law Board to preside over that Committee, and, indeed, it was only in consequence of the very courteous request unanimously expressed that I should take the chair, that I consented to do so. I mention this to show what was at that time the ill feeling towards the Central Board, which at this day is censured because, as it was thought, it had not acted with sufficient energy, and had not more frequently engaged in conflict and collision with the local authorities. For some weeks at first, that Committee was engaged in investigating a charge, which was generally credited in the country, that owing to embarrassing and vexatious regulations on the part of the Board interfering with the discretion of the local authorities, the guardians of unions and parishes in London had not been able to make effective arrangement for the relief of the poor during the severe winter of 1861, when swarms of people were thrown out of employment, and were in the greatest distress. There was almost a panic in the metropolis, and the rumour industriously circulated was that the guardians would have been equal to the emergency but for the interference of the Poor Law Board. The prejudice against the Board was never higher than at the period to which I am referring. The Committee began its labours in 1861, and did not bring them to a close till 1864. After having examined witnesses of every class, the Committee, though it commenced the inquiry under all this ill will against the Board, came to the conclusion that the Board ought to be continued, and that the power which was especially objected to—namely, the power of issuing orders, which were said to have the effect of law, and therefore to be unconstitutional, ought also to be continued. The Committee also expressed their opinion that these orders had only been issued for the benefit of the poor, and of the persons whom they concerned. Looking at the spirit in which that inquiry was commenced, and the very hostile feeling manifested by the guardians towards the Central Board, and I may almost say by the public also, owing to the excessive power which, as they considered, it possessed, it would not have been prudent on the part of the Board if they had chosen that opportunity to proceed against the guardians in Courts of Law, and to engage in what the right hon. Gentleman termed “unseemly collision” with the local authorities. And I think if the right hon. Gentleman shrunk from doing so in the past autumn, when public opinion had so much changed, and circumstances so much favoured his proceedings, that I cannot be blamed for not having commenced legal proceedings during the time that the Committee was sitting. I am not complaining of the remarks made by the right hon. Gentleman; but when reflections are cast upon the Board for not having acted with more energy against the local authorities, I wish to remind the House of the state of feeling against the Central Board during that period. If the right hon. Gentleman is able to take action now it is because a better feeling has, for various reasons to which I will not allude, arisen for some time past towards the Central Board. The right hon. Gentleman, at the commencement of his speech the other night, referred to the opinion expressed by that Committee, that the provision made for the medical relief of the poor was satisfactory, and that they saw no reason to recommend any change in it. That was the opinion of the Committee, nor can they be fairly blamed for coming to that conclusion. They examined witnesses, called before them a number of medical men, and had besides a vast amount of documentary evidence on the subject. They also had before them the Reports of two Committees of this House, which were appointed for the distinct purpose of inquiring into that matter. And the recommendations which had been made by both those Committees had been strictly carried out by the Poor Law Board. The Committee arrived at its conclusion in consequence of observing that great improvements had taken place in the position of the medical officers; that additional facilities had been given to the poor in having access to medical relief; and they could not do other than conclude that, at the time of this investigation, the poor were treated better than they ever had been before. I do not say that that is an excuse for the evils that still exist, and I cannot deny that the present system is very defective. But at the time when the Committee were pursuing their inquiry, the arrangements providing for medical relief were better than they had been at any previous period. The Committee of 1854 recommended that the medical officers should be made independent by being elected for life instead of annually, and that any treatment which they suggested for the sick poor should be complied with by the guardians. Now; that was a very important change in the position of the medical officers, who thus became independent of the will and caprice of the guardians. The Committee of 1861 found, likewise, that the amount paid in salaries of the medical officers had been increased, that their districts had been diminished, and that more officers had been appointed. They also had before them the regulations which the Poor Law Board had framed with a view to the attention which the sick poor in the workhouses were to receive from the guardians and medical officers; and these, doubtless, had much influence on the Committee in leading them to express their satisfaction with the arrangements made for the medical treatment of the poor. The regulations to which I am referring were drawn up by some of the wisest and ablest men that have ever acted in connection with the Poor Law Board—namely, Sir George Nichol, Sir George Lewis, and Sir Edmund Head. They, as I know, devoted much time to the subject, and drew up orders for the general relief of the poor, giving special attention to the relief of the sick poor. In these orders the medical officers are required to be competent persons—that is to say, that there should be no longer any competition by tender, as was formerly the practice, and that no person should be appointed who had not received a diploma, or certificate from some University or other competent institution, declaring that he was a fit person to practice medicine and surgery throughout the United Kingdom. They next decided that his salary should be fixed, and that he should be as much aware of the circumstances of his position as a clergyman or curate should be before he accepted his preferment. They then empowered the medical officer to call upon the guardians to provide whatever in his opinion would conduce to the comfort, health, and recovery of the patient. They further made a regulation which was to be binding upon every medical officer with the view to prevent improper crowding, and they state, in their Report to Parliament, that they had felt it desirable to take these precautions in order to render it difficult for the overcrowding of inmates to occur again. They further made it a positive duty of the medical officer to report in writing to the guardians any defect in diet, ventilation, warming, or any other arrangement of the workhouses, and any excess in the number of inmates which would be detrimental to the health of the inmates. And these regulations every medical officer is well acquainted with when he accepts his office. But the Commissioners were not satisfied with this direction to the medical officers. They provided, likewise, that the guardians should appoint a certain number of their own body to act as a visiting committee; and the persons so named or told off by the guardians for this purpose were called upon to visit every sick ward, to see every sick patient, and to make an entry in writing of the condition in which they found each ward. And not only were they called upon to make these entries in a book, but that book was to be printed and brought before the Board of Guardians every week, in order that its contents might be taken into consideration. Looking, therefore, at the fact that the management of every workhouse is vested in the guardians by law, that they have complete control over every department, and that every person connected with these establishments is appointed and employed by them, it is clear that if these directions had been attended to cases like those which have been lately made public could not have occurred. The Committee of 1861 were doubtless satisfied at the manner in which the Poor Law Board had carried out the recommendations of former Committees; but if the regulations of the Poor Law Board are not attended to by the guardians, abuses and irregularities of every kind are certain to occur. It was only a few months, indeed, after the Report of that Committee was published that the unfortunate case of the man Gibson, to which the right hon. Gentleman referred the other night, occurred in the Bloomsbury Workhouse. This is precisely a case in point, for the observance of the Poor Law regulations would have just prevented the neglect and the abuses which are said to have there occurred. At the coroner's inquest which took place in reference to this event the jury found that, although the unfortunate man must have died in any case from the pressure of serum on the brain, yet that his death was accelerated by the neglect of all the officers of the workhouse, including the master, the doctor, the visiting committee, and the attendants upon the patients. This neglect occurred in a very wealthy and important district, and not only had these very guardians received a copy of the regulations, but on account of their avowed defiance of the Board proceedings had been instituted against them in the Court of Queen's Bench by the Poor Law Board. In these proceedings, however, the Poor Law Board had been unsuccessful, as the guardians were protected by a local Act, which seemed to give them an independent management of their poor. On that occasion I remember that I sent for the list of the guardians then in power, and certainly, looking to their description and station in life, it was impossible to imagine a more respectable body of gentlemen associated for the purpose, and one would have thought it impossible to select persons to fulfil that office who would have been more likely to attend to their duties. And no persons, no doubt, were more shocked at the disclosures that took place than those who formed that Board; but they knew nothing of what was going on. Every regulation which had been made, every precaution which had been directed, had been neglected. The doctor had not duly attended the man. The visiting committee had not examined the wards. There had been no report made as to the doctor's or inspector's request for the improvement of the wards. There was no evidence of the mismanagement that was going on to be found in the books, or in the entries made by the direction of the Poor Law Board. This was a case, no doubt, where the disclosures peculiarly shocked the public, and it had this redeeming circumstance about it, that it probably had the effect, above every other, of awakening the feelings of many intelligent and benevolent persons relative to the attention which the sick poor actually received in these infirmaries; and when these and other similar cases came to be known and understood, they doubtless tended much to change the public feeling with regard to a Central Board, and impressed them rather with the necessity of adding to its powers than curtailing them. After this case was brought before the public numerous communications were received by the Poor Law Board with regard to other unions, some, indeed, from inmates themselves; and it was impossible not to see that an impression prevailed that the sick poor of these infirmaries were practically much neglected or insufficiently attended to. Among other communications which reached the Board was one from no less a person than Miss Nightingale, who, from her general experience, and from directing her attention particularly to the subject, pressed upon them the great importance of having properly trained persons to attend upon the sick, and considered that the attendance of trained nurses upon these unfortunate people was almost of more importance than the attendance of doctors or the administration of medicine. This case also gave rise to that very important and interesting inquiry which was conducted by three well-known medical gentlemen—Dr. Hart, Dr. Carr, and Dr. Anstie—who, after visiting every workhouse infirmary in London, came to the conclusion that these workhouse infirmaries, judging them by the high standard regarded at present in our public hospitals, were unfit for the treatment of the sick. Their evidence was sufficiently confirmed by the very intelligent and able reports made afterwards by the direction of the Board by Dr. Smith and Mr. Farnall, and again by the medical gentleman appointed for the purpose by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. These inquiries produced a great effect on the country, and by this means legislation has become possible in the matter. The question for the decision of the House is a very important one. A vast number of sick and destitute persons have by law a claim for relief upon the State; and from the benevolent feelings which have been manifested, both in and out of this House, it is evidently the universal desire that these people, numerous as they are, should be relieved and treated in a manner most conducive to their comfort and their recovery. Having this object in view, and with the information we now possess, we are in a position to judge of the measure which has been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman. In the face of our past experience no doubt can exist that, in the first place, the sick poor must be treated distinctly and separately from all other paupers who have to be provided for in the workhouses. That I understand to be an opinion distinctly adopted by the right hon. Gentleman and by the public generally. The right hon. Gentleman has, indeed, made a statement with regard to the treatment of these unfortunate persons which have excited great interest, and, perhaps, apprehension on the part of some persons. He has made the admission clearly and distinctly that these persons form a charge upon the metropolis generally; that they should no longer constitute a local burden upon its various districts, inasmuch as their health and recovery are a matter of general and not of local concern; and that the charge incurred in their behalf should be borne in consequence by the property of the whole metropolis. This is a most important admission; for, unless this principle is acted upon, there will be but small chance of any improvement being permanent. It is one that has been contended for by some Members on the score of justice for some years past; but, looking to the excuses made for past neglect, it is important in every respect. I have always considered it to be just, and that the time must come when it would be admitted. The right hon. Gentleman, however, goes even further in support of it when he says it belongs to a class of expenditure connected with the Poor Law which may be regarded as fixed, in character and limited, or—to use his expression—as not likely to be jobbed; that the number of the sick are not likely to be increased by any want of judgment or honesty in the administration of the relief; that illness among the poor is an evil they would themselves do anything to avert; that it is, as it were, a given quantity; and that, in certain districts, it is just to throw the charge over the whole area where they dwell. This has already in some respects been acted upon in the metropolis, and the right hon. Gentleman has appropriately referred to the Act under which Sir Robert Peel, with the view to relieve local property, cast the charge for medical officers of unions and others upon the Consolidated Fund. I believe this policy is a sound one, and that where there are fixed charges of this kind they should be borne generally. The charge for the poor is as much a national charge as the interest on the National Debt, or the public service, and it is only fair, when we can safely do so, to place it on the whole property of the country. From the great fear of indefinitely increasing the charge for the poor, there has been a great reluctance hitherto to admit this doctrine; but in this case I doubt if there is any danger, and, in my opinion, at present the charge of the poor rate is very capricious and unfair. The State undertakes to support the destitute poor of this country, and it seems to me that there is considerable injustice, and something like caprice, in saying that persons shall only be liable to contribute to the poor whose property is local and visible. That might be right when the Poor Law originated, because there was then little property that was not tangible; but I think it unjust, seeing how various are the descriptions of other property now held by individuals, that they should not contribute in proportion to that property to this national charge, where it can be done without danger; and if there is a class of Poor Law expenditure which cannot be increased by jobbery, or maladministration, it is to be regretted that it cannot be fixed on the property of the country; and, indeed, the same principle which now casts these charges on a common fund of the metropolis seems to point also to the Consolidated Fund. I do not complain of the measure of the right hon. Gentleman—I hail it with satisfaction; but I think his reasoning in support of it would carry him somewhat further. I do not express that opinion for the first time. I was acting on the original Commission appointed to inquire into the old Poor Law, and I was struck upon that inquiry by the extraordinary unfairness in which the charge for the poor fell in different parts of the country, and on different persons, and the vast number who, indeed, then were wholly exempt from a charge which ought to fall on every man with the means of contributing to it. This however, shows the importance that attaches to the measure now before us. Seeing that this Bill is an extension of a better system of distributing the charge for the poor, which has recently been adopted by the House, and, as I value it very much for the consequences which will flow from it, I should be the last person to throw any impediment in the way of its passing; but I think the right hon. Gentleman must expect to meet with some—

I do not say opposition—but some questioning as to the manner in which he has applied his principle. It seems to me that application is hardly sufficient. Considering the admissions he has made, I hardly think his principles are fully carried out by the Bill he has introduced. So far as I understood him—I was not present when he delivered it, but I have read his speech in the newspapers—I collected that he was going to cast the sick poor of the metropolis on the property of the metropolis. In looking at the Bill I find there are exceptions to be made in that respect, and he will, I think, be required to state his reasons for drawing the line where he has, as to the class of sick to be supported by the common fund, and those still to be a local charge. If I understand it rightly, the sick that are to be charged upon the general fund are only those who are visited with scarlet fever, small pox, and madness. All other sick are to be supported by the local fund. Now, I cannot quite understand the reason of this; I think it quite reasonable for the right hon. Gentleman to say that no person will simulate the diseases that he places on the general fund; and he is going, I believe, to erect asylums in which he will place persons affected with those particular diseases; and wherever any of the other sick are to be placed they will be separated entirely from the other poor. Then, I want to know why, if persons with scarlet fever, small pox, and madness in these infirmaries or asylums are thrown on the common fund, why those with cancers, syphilis, or bronchitis are not to go on the general fund likewise? Surely these diseases would not be simulated any more than fever or small pox. Indeed, I might ask, why the charge for the sick in general in the workhouses should not be placed on the general fund. If they are destitute and sick, and maintained already in the union infirmary, why should that maintenance not be carried to the general fund? Then, looking to the great conclusion we have arrived at from past experience—namely, that the guardians have no aptitude for superintending the treatment of the sick, I hardly understand their position in these asylums. I do not conceive that guardians are qualified to be placed at the head of medical establishments. The general belief that has hitherto existed is, that because guardians took one view and the doctors another as to what might be necessary for the treatment of their patients, the guardians considering it to be their chief duty to curtail the expenditure, the poor in consequence have not been properly treated, and the regulations of the Poor Law Board, which required harmonious action between the guardians and doctors, have not been successful. The doctors have called for more ventilation, more attendants, and some change in the structure of the house; but they have met with refusal from the guardians on the ground of expense—partly because the guardians do not appreciate the present requirements for the treatment of the sick—not that they are chargeable with any want of humanity, but because they are persons whose previous experience as well as their sense of duty lead them to look to economy more than the importance of sanitary regulations, and object to what the doctors require on the score of increased expense. The doctors go on remonstrating; but the places remain ill-ventilated, the attendance is insufficient, and the result is that these disclosures take place. Under these circumstances, I cannot but think that these poor people should be treated as in hospitals, superintended by persons whose education and interests qualify them for the post. But so much having been seen to show the inappropriateness of the guardians superintending establishments for the sick, I do not understand why the right hon. Gentleman, in providing these asylums or hospitals, should place guardians at their head. Is not this tantamount to the continuance of the system which has already failed? It is true the right hon. Gentleman proposes to prevent the repetition of mischiefs which have heretofore occurred in the infirmaries by associating nominees of his own with them in the proportion to one-third. But in looking for the qualifications of such persons for the office, I find that it is rateable value. That is certainly a questionable qualification for persons who are to have the superintendence of medical establishments; and I should rather have thought that the best persons to associate with the guardians would have been persons who were known to be qualified for the purpose, or who might have a personal interest in discharging their duty. What we want is competency in those appointed to this office—persons who feel themselves strictly responsible for the discharge of the duties imposed on them, and for this purpose, if remuneration is necessary, it should be provided. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will direct his attention to this point; because the criticisms on his Bill that one hears of are very much founded on the question of nominees or persons to manage the asylums. With respect to the better treatment of the sick poor generally in the metropolis, I must say that it will be incomplete if we do not deal with a portion of the case not much spoken of, but which, perhaps, is more important than any other—I mean the treatment of the outdoor sick. They exceed the indoor sick poor, and, of course, if their cases are not properly attended to, the spread of illness by their means is much more likely to occur than in the case of the indoor sick. By a Return that I moved for, it appears that the outdoor cases of acute disease are more numerous than the chronic cases, which shows farther the necessity for dealing with this point, as these poor people, of course, become more dangerous to the public health than those within the house. The provisions of the Bill which proposes to establish dispensaries have peculiar interest on this account. I think that the right hon. Gentleman said that he took the idea of establishing them from the experience of similar institutions in Ireland, and certainly it is calculated to meet to a certain extent the case of the outdoor poor. At present the public know little about their treatment at their wretched homes, or what may be their end; whereas, in the case of deaths occurring among the indoor sick, very often a coroner's inquest is held, and if there has been neglect, great sensation is produced. As far as I understand, there will, by means of the establishment of these dispensaries, be more attention paid by the medical officers to the outdoor sick; care will be taken that proper medicines are administered; the prescriptions are to be written by the medical men; and those, I presume, will be recorded at the dispensary. That is, no doubt, a great improvement, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman has, as far as necessary, inquired into the management of public dispensaries where they exist at present; because it is said that great frauds are often practised there, and that a great number of persons not entitled to be relieved at the public expense yet obtain medical relief at the cost of the district. The statement of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the assistance he received in providing for this system very strongly recommends itself to me; because I have the greatest confidence in the acuteness, industry, and soundness of view of the gentleman whom he consulted, and who went to Ireland, and I am sure the whole matter will be carefully considered. I allude to Mr. Lambert. I think this part of the Bill, if properly developed, may prove a most substantial improvement in the present system. What is not so easy to understand at present is why the expense of these dispensaries, and of all the persons relieved medicinally by them, though they may be persons without any specific maladies, is to be cast on the common fund, while the general indoor sick are thrown upon the local fund. If a medical officer should think more nutritious diet and not medicine was required by a patient of the dispensary, the expense would be cast upon the union; but if he thought medicine was necessary, then the charge would be borne by the general fund. Why should there be this difference in providing for the cost of the relief given, according as it might be, either mutton or medicine? There seems something like capriciousness in this arrangement, and it appears to me that the charge for the sick poor chargeable on the unions applying to the dispensaries might be thrown on the common fund. There will, however, be an opportunity of discussing these various matters in Committee; and having nothing to complain of in the principle of the Bill, I hope it will be there considered. In the last clause there is a provision which ought long since to have been established, and which ought to be more extended, at least in the opinion of those who like myself are favourable to the extension of the authority of the Poor Law Board. The clause I refer to provides that, in case of an asylum or dispensary, or Board of Guardians failing, on the requisition of the Poor Law Board, to appoint to a vacancy any officer whom they are by law required to appoint, the Poor Law Board may nominate a fit person for such office. I am sorry, however, since the right hon. Gentleman has looked to the practice of Ireland, that he has not gone further, and adopted another provision to the effect that, in case the local authorities refuse to carry out the regulations of the Poor Law Board, the latter shall have the power of superseding them for a certain time, and of appointing an officer of their own to administer the law in the place of those local authorities. I am informed that it has very rarely happened that the guardians in Ireland, who know that such a power exists, have refused to carry out the regulations of the Central Commission. I think a similar power ought to be possessed by the Poor Law Board in this country. At present there is a divided jurisdiction. There is the power technically given by the Poor Law Act to the Poor Law Board to regulate the management of the workhouse, and yet there exists no practical means of enforcing it. The Poor Law Board is thus constantly blamed for matters in respect to which that Board has practically no authority over the local Boards. If there is to be a central authority with responsibility, it should not be allowed to be trifled with by the local authorities. The Board ought to have larger powers, and be fixed with the responsibility which attends the exercise of them. This question ought now to be decided, for at present it is difficult to know who is in certain cases to blame. It is said the time had come when the Board should be made a permanent establishment; but that will not be sufficient unless it is invested with sufficient power. The right hon. Gentleman proposes to some extent to increase the power of the Board, and I shall certainly support that part of the Bill—the only question with me is whether he has gone far enough. The Board ought, in fact, to be responsible for the manner in which the poor are treated. Already it may be learned that wherever the regulations of the Board are really carried out there has been no reason to complain, and their being generally enforced should no longer depend upon chance. This is a point which I trust the right hon. Gentleman will consider.

Speech of the RIGHT HON. C. P. VILLIERS on the Second Reading of the "VALUATION OF PROPERTY BILL," March 11.

[A Revised Report.]

MR. C. P. VILLIERS * said, he could not join in the wish expressed by the hon. Member that this Bill should not be referred to a Select Committee, seeing that great objections had been expressed either to its principles or details by hon. Members on both sides of the House, and that he thought himself that the Bill was somewhat premature—the only Member (Mr. Danby Seymour) that entirely approved of it, did so for a purpose totally opposed to that of its promoters. That hon. Member was anxious to control the expenditure in counties, and he seemed to see a prospect of this Board being summoned for one purpose and ultimately used for another, and he (Mr. Danby Seymour) thought that this Board might serve to control the county expenditure generally. The House need not, however, think of any ulterior purpose when they had one already before them. It was urged in favour of the Bill that it would constitute a Board where the ratepayers, represented by the guardians and the magistrates, would be combined together for a purpose in which all were interested; but, anybody acquainted with the position and habits of elected guardians would know that they could not afford to go a great distance and give up much time without their expenses being paid, so that in practice the regulation of the assessments would fall under the complete control of the justices. One of the great objects of the present Assessment Act was to obtain an accurate estimate of the value of the property to be rated, and that object had been, he believed, very fairly attained. At first it was to be expected that the assessment committee would not agree precisely as to the amount of deduction that was to be made in order to get at the rateable value. Considering, however, the time that the Act had been in operation, it was no slight work that it had accomplished, looking also to the gross imperfection of the former system, to have obtained an accurate valuation of all the property to be rated. Considering how much alive the people of this country were to the subject of taxation, it was astonishing that they should ever have allowed so large a revenue to be collected in so slovenly and uncertain a manner. The amount of neglect and injustice that had existed under the old system was beyond description — already the new assessment had brought to charge upwards of £15,000,000 annually, which had escaped before. The valuations had been left to ignorant and irresponsible persons, and the consequence was that there was much property that had either not been valued at all, or not re-valued for years together, notwithstanding great changes in the circumstances of the place. The property of persons of influence in many cases remained rated much too low. There were instances of property which had been raised in value 400 per cent, and there were parishes which had never been re-assessed during the present century. This has all been altered, and the same things, under the present Act, can never recur. In these respects, he had not collected from the Member for Northamptonshire that the Bill had not acted well, and he must suppose that he (Mr. Hunt) only thought that he could make it act better. He (Mr. C. P. Villiers) would not say that it might not be improved; but he could not see that its deficiencies had been such as to require such an elaborate—he would not say cumbersome—machinery to amend it. Generally speaking, he thought the Act had given great satisfaction; doubtless there may have been complaints of the decisions of assessment committees in particular cases. Every facility, however, was given for rehearing and appeal; and after the valuation lists were published, every parish was entitled to question the assessment of any other parish, and even the assessment of individual ratepayers of one parish might be challenged by those in another. The assessment committee, also, could easily be called together to re-hear any particular case. Hon. Members said that there were people who felt themselves wronged; still, there did not seem to have been much disposition to appeal, nor could that be said to be only from not desiring to attend at the quarter sessions, for there were special sessions appointed to be held four times a year, for the purpose of hearing questions of rating. Of course, he was aware in what respect these assessment committees were said to be at fault, and the House had before it the Return procured by the hon. Member for Buckingham showing considerable difference and want of uniformity in the unions, in the deductions they made from gross value, declared to be necessary to obtain the rateable value. He did not believe these differences to be necessary, and he could hardly account for them. The object of the deduction was very simple, and could not be difficult to estimate honestly. It is thought right, previously to rating property, to make an allowance for what might be deemed necessary each year to keep the property in the state of repair, and that would maintain it at the same value, together with what might be required for insurance.

When, therefore, the real value of the property had been ascertained, which was the matter of chief importance, the deduction for repairs and insurance ought not to be difficult to fix. By making use of professional assistance at first, it would be easy to determine upon some rule for different kinds of property, and then the application of it need not vary. But the great publicity given to the valuation lists under the present Act must check any great irregularity continuing on this account. The 10th clause of the present Bill professed to discover some maximum or fixed rule of deduction. He did not see why, if that were possible to be done justly, it should not be the subject of a simple enactment for the purpose. If it were not possible, he did not know how by a conjunction of magistrates and ratepayers—but he thought practically they would be magistrates only—it would be possible to discover it. It might happen, now, that sometimes from error, or sometimes from favour, these differences in the deductions might occur; at the same time, an arbitrary and unbending rule fixed upon by Act of Parliament might operate with great injustice. The decay of one class of houses would be more rapid than of another, and it might be proper to put 20 or 25 per cent on one class and 15 per cent on another, and the deduction fixed by an Act applicable to all houses and all lands might be objectionable. The professed purpose of the Bill was to discover that rule or maximum; but it did not require a great apparatus of barristers and others to discover whether that rule, when fixed, had been applied. He presumed that it would require no less than fifty-two barristers of ten years' standing to be at once appointed, that is, one for each county. [Mr. Hunt: No; only as they were wanted.] Then they were to be paid by the piece. That, certainly, would not make the work shorter. He did not deny that the object of the Bill was a good one, so far as it was to produce uniformity of valuation for the different purposes for which the same property was to be rated; but seeing how much danger there might be in passing it in its present shape, and how little ground had been laid for complaint against the present Act, he trusted that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hunt) would not scruple to refer the Bill to a Committee upstairs.

REPRESENTATION OF THE PEOPLE.

THE RESOLUTIONS

referred to by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, on the 11th February.

In Committee on the Act 2 and 3 William IV., on the Representation of the People, to move the following Resolutions:—

This House having, in the last Session of Parliament, assented to the Second Reading of a Bill, intituled “A Bill to extend the right of Voting at Elections of Members of Parliament in England and Wales,” is of opinion,

1. That the number of Electors for Counties and Boroughs in England and Wales ought to be increased.

2. That such increase may best be effected by both reducing the value of the qualifying Tenement in Counties and Boroughs, and by adding other Franchises not dependent on such value.

3. That, while it is desirable that a more direct Representation should be given to the Labouring Class, it is contrary to the Constitution of this Realm to give to any one class or interest a predominating power over the rest of the Community.

4. That the Occupation Franchise in Counties and Boroughs shall be based upon the principle of Rating.

5. That the principle of Plurality of Votes, if adopted by Parliament, would facilitate the settlement of the Borough Franchise on an extensive basis.

6. That it is expedient to revise the existing Distribution of Seats.

7. That in such revision it is not expedient that any Borough now represented in Parliament should be wholly Disfranchised.

8. That, in revising the existing Distribution of Seats, this House will acknowledge, as its main consideration, the expediency of supplying Representation to places not at present represented, and which may be considered entitled to that privilege.

9. That it is expedient that provision should be made for the better prevention of Bribery and Corruption at Elections.

10. That it is expedient that the system of Registration of Voters in Counties should be assimilated, as far as possible, to that which prevails in Boroughs.

11. That it shall be open to every Parliamentary Elector, if he think fit, to record his vote by means of a polling paper, duly signed and authenticated.

12. That provision be made for diminishing the distance which Voters have to travel for the purpose of recording their votes, so that no expenditure for such purpose shall hereafter be legal.

13. That a humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying Her Majesty to issue a Royal Commission to form and submit to the consideration of Parliament a scheme for new and enlarged Boundaries of the existing Parliamentary Boroughs where the population extends beyond the limit now assigned to such Boroughs; and to fix, subject to the decision of Parliament, the Boundaries of such other Boroughs as Parliament may deem fit to be represented in this House.

INDEX

TO

HANSARD'S PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES, VOLUME CLXXXV:

FIRST VOLUME OF THE SESSION 1867.

EXPLANATION OF THE ABBREVIATIONS.

In Bills, Read 1^o, 2^o, 3^o, or 1^a, 2^a, 3^a, Read the First, Second, or Third Time.—In Speeches, 1R., 2R., 3R., Speech delivered on the First, Second, or Third Reading.—Amendt., Amendment.—Res., Resolution.—Comm., Committee.—Re-Comm., Re-Committal.—Rep., Report.—Consid., Consideration.—Adj., Adjournment or Adjourned.—cl., Clause.—add. cl., Additional Clause.—neg., Negated.—M. Q., Main Question.—O. Q., Original Question.—O. M., Original Motion.—P. Q., Previous Question.—a. p., Report Progress.—A., Ayes.—N., Noes.—M., Majority.—1st. Div., 2nd. Div., First or Second Division.—l., Lords.—c., Commons.

When in this Index a * is added to the Reading of a Bill, it indicates that no Debate took place upon that stage of the measure.

When in the Text or in the Index a Speech is marked thus *, it indicates that the Speech is reprinted from a Pamphlet or some authorized Report.

When in the Index a † is prefixed to a Name or an Office (the Member having accepted or vacated office during the Session) and to Subjects of Debate thereunder, it indicates that the Speeches on those Subjects were delivered in the speaker's private or official character, as the case may be.

ABYSSINIA—Imprisonment of British Subjects in Question, Mr. Darby Griffith; Answer, Lord Stanley, Mar 5, 1836

ADDERLEY, Right Hon. C. B., (Under Secretary of State for the Colonies) Staffordshire, N.

British Honduras, Colony of, 1805
British North America, 2R. 1164, 1181;
Comm. cl. 41, 1316; cl. 53, ib.; cl. 56, 1317; cl. 58, 1318; cl. 69, 1319; cl. 91, ib.;
cl. 145, 1320

Canada—Extradition of M. Lamirande, 1339
Colonial Bishops, 337
Coolies, Exportation of (East Indies), 1252
Jamaica, Ecclesiastical Establishment, 460
Missionaries, Grants for, 726
New Zealand—British Troops in, 282, 1933
Straits Settlements, 1604, 1605, 1607
West Indies—Quarantine in the, 722;—Mortality in the Harbour of St. Thomas, ib.

VOL. CLXXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Admiralty Jurisdiction Bill

(Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Cave)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 18, 529 [Bill 28]

AGAR-ELLIS, Hon. L. G. F., Kilkenny Co. Tenants Improvements (Ireland), Leave, 547

AGNEW, Sir A., Wigtonshire
Dogs, Duty on, 1143

Agricultural Gangs

Question, The Earl of Shaftesbury; Answer, The Earl of Belmore Feb 25, 906

Agricultural Statistics

Question, Mr. M'Lagan; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote Feb 18, 461

AIRLIE, Earl of

Hypothec Amendment (Scotland), 2R. 1227

AKROYD, Mr. E., HalifaxFactory Acts (Educational Clauses), Res. 1071
Paris Universal Exhibition, 1801
Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 1579Alimony Arrears Bill [H.L.]

(The Viscount Lifford)

1. Presented; read 1st Feb 18 (No. 17)
Read 2nd Feb 25
Committee*; Report Mar 11ALLEN, Mr. W. S., Newcastle-under-Lyme Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1406AMBERLEY, Viscount, Nottingham

Paris Exhibition—English Jurors, 1143

Animals, Trade inQuestion, Mr. M'Lagan; Answer, Mr. Corry
Feb 19, 584Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh, Parish of Canongate) Bill

(Mr. M'Laren, Mr. Dunlop, Mr. Baines)

c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 6 [Bill 2]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2nd" (Mr. M'Laren) Feb 20, 655
Amendt. To leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Sir James Fergusson); after long debate, Question, "That 'now,' &c.;" A. 74, N. 107; M. 33; words added; main Question put, and agreed to; Bill put off for six months; Division List, Ayes and Noes, 677ANSON, Hon. A. H. A., LichfieldArmy—Flogging in the, Res. 1956
Army (India and the Colonies), Motion for a Committee, 1032, 1064ANSTRUTHER, Sir R., FifeshireArmy—Medical Officers of the Guards, 584
Scotland—Sanitary Laws, 461;—Poor Law, 586;—Road Reform, 1231ARCHDALL, Captain M. E., Formanagh Co.
Ireland—Rumoured Disturbances in, 336ARGYLL, Duke ofCrete—Insurrection in, Motion for Papers, 1512, 1527, 1539, 1544
Hypothec Amendment (Scotland), Comm. 1429
Masters and Operatives, 2R. 697
Tenure of Land (Ireland), 1R. 803Army

Army Estimates, Question, Captain Gridley; Answer, General Peel Feb 11, 213; Observations, General Peel Feb 18, 459; Question, Captain Vivian; Answer, General Peel Mar 4, 1308; Question, Captain Vivian;

[cont.]

Army—cont.Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 11, 1647—Supplementary, Question Captain Vivian; Answer, General Peel Mar 1, 1233

Army (India and the Colonies), Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the duties performed by the British Army in India and the Colonies; and also to inquire how far it might be desirable to employ certain portions of Her Majesty's Native Indian Army in our Colonial and Military Dependencies" (Major Anson) Feb 26, 1032

Amendt. to add "or to organize a force of Asiatic Troops for general service in suitable climates" (Mr. O'Reilly); after long debate, Question, "That the words, &c.," put, and agreed to; main Question put, and agreed to; Select Committee appointed; List of the Committee, 1064

Artillery—Stud Shot, Question, Mr. Henry Baillie; Answer, General Peel Feb 21, 735
Corporal Punishment, Question, Mr. Otway; Answer, General Peel Feb 18, 463

Flogging in the, Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar 15, To leave out from "That" and add "this House, reserving for future consideration when requisite the question of the exigencies of a state of war, is of opinion that it is unnecessary that the punishment of flogging should be awarded during the time of peace to Soldiers of the Army or Corps of Royal Marines serving on Shore" (Mr. Otway), 1951; after long debate, A. 107, N. 108; M. 1; Division List, Ayes and Noes, 1989

Government Powder Magazines, Question, Mr. Sergeant Kinglake; Answer, General Peel Feb 22, 812

Land Transport, Question, Captain Vivian; Answer, General Peel Feb 28, 1144

Medical Officers of the Brigade of Guards, Question, Sir Robert Anstruther; Answer, General Peel Feb 19, 584

Military Store Department, Question, Mr. Oliphant; Answer, Mr. Hunt Feb 18, 463

Militia, Question, Earl Cowper; Answer, The Earl of Longford Mar 8, 1545—Quartermasters of, Question, Major Walker; Answer, General Peel Feb 18, 467

Patents for the Improvement of Small Arms, Question, Viscount Lifford; Answer, The Earl of Longford Feb 22, 807

Recruiting Commission, Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Return of the Recommendations of the Recruiting Commission of 1866, and the Steps taken thereon" (The Earl of Dalhousie) Mar 14, 1768; after long debate, Motion agreed to Rewards to Inventors—Major Palliser, Question, Mr. Henry Baillie; Answer, General Peel Feb 14, 340Small Arms—Converted Enfield Rifle, Question, Earl De Grey and Ripon; Answer, The Earl of Longford Mar 1, 1211Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings Bill

(Mr. M.C. Torrens, Mr. Kinnaird, Mr. Locke)c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 12, 290 [Bill 14]

Associations of Workmen Bill

(Mr. Neate, Mr. Thomas Hughes)

c. Ordered Feb 12, 1899

Read 1^o Feb 14

[Bill 21]

ATTORNEY GENERAL, The (Sir J. Rolt)
Gloucestershire, W.

Bankruptcy, Leave, 1867, 1887

Banns of Matrimony, 1800

Criminal Law, Leave, 206

Execution of Deeds, 2R. 1184; Comm. Amendt. 1417

Law, Administration of the, 852, 864

Light and Air to Ancient Windows, 1245

Mortmain, Law of, 583

Religious, &c. Buildings (Sites), Leave, 1283

Trades Unions, Leave, 198; Comm. cl. 5, 998, 999

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 1576, 1579

Attorneys, &c., Certificate Duty Bill

(Mr. Denman, Mr. Vance, Sir John Ogilvy)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 26, 1864

[Bill 58]

AYRTON, Mr. A. S., Tower Hamlets

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1509, 1992

Bankruptcy, Leave, 1883

Business, Public, 1370

Counsel to the Secretary of State for India, 2R. 1207; Comm. 1335

Dogs, Duty on, Comm. Res. 451; Comm. cl. 2, 1198; cl. 9, 1200

Education, 1164

Factory Acts (Educational Clauses), Res. 1086

Finsbury Estate, 2R. 301, 329

Metropolitan Poor, Leave, 175; Comm. cl. 5, 1612, 1614; cl. 9, 1616, 1622; cl. 10, Amendt. 1623; cl. 41, 1675; cl. 49, 1681;

cl. 55, 1682; cl. 59, 1686; cl. 65, 1688;

cl. 69, 1689, 1692; cl. 79, 1695, 1697; 3R. 1863

Navy Estimates, 1992

Representation of the People—The Resolutions, 480, 1573

Supply—Royal Palaces, Amendt. 505, 511

Trades Unions, Leave, 197; Comm. cl. 2, 996; cl. 5, 997, 999, 1000

Valuation of Property, Leave, 255

AYTON, Mr. R. S., Kirkcaldy

British North America, 2R. 1180; Comm. cl. 145, 1320

Metropolitan Poor, 2R. 770

Railway Debenture Holders, 2R. 783

BAGNALL, Mr. C., Whitby

Mines, &c. Assessment, Leave, 651

BAGWELL, Mr. J., Clonmel

Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance, 2R. 740; Comm. cl. 1, Amendt. 898

Ireland—Rumoured Disturbances in, 336;—

Waterford Election, 723

Offices and Oaths, 2R. 1099

BATLIE, Rt. Hon. H. J., Inverness-shire

Army—Artillery—Stud Shot, 725

Palliser, Major—Rewards to Inventors, 840

Representation of the People—Electoral Statistics, 1824

BAINES, Mr. E., Leeds

Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 77

Libel, 2R. 1736

Representation of the People—Franchises, 467

Bankruptcy Bill

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Secretary Walpole,

Mr. Solicitor General)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 14, 1867 [Bill 74]

Bankruptcy Acts Repeal Bill

(Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Secretary Walpole,

Mr. Solicitor General)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 14 [Bill 76]

Banns of Matrimony

Question, Mr. Monk; Answer, The Attorney General Mar 14, 1800

BARNES, Mr. T., Bolton

India—Famine in Orissa, 1645

BARRON, Sir H. W., Waterford City

Metropolis—Park Lane and Halkin Street, 465

BARROW, Mr. W. H., Nottinghamshire, S.

Dogs, Duty on, 2R. 781

Ireland—Railways, Res. 1948

Trades Unions, Leave, 201; Comm. cl. 5, 998

BARRY, Mr. Serjeant C. R., Dungarvan

Ireland—Waterford County Election, 1030, 1031

BARTLELOT, Colonel W. B., Sussex, W.

Valuation of Property, 2R. 1650

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 1559

BASS, Mr. M. T., Derby

Attorneys, &c. Certificate Duty, Leave, 1065

Navy—Dockyards, Res. 644

Rating and Rentals, 284

Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1408

Storm Signals of the Board of Trade, 1030

BAXTER, Mr. W. E., Montrose, &c.

Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), 2R. 667

Jamaica—Ecclesiastical Establishment, 460

Murder Law Amendment, Leave, 369

Offices and Oaths, 2R. 1123

Scotland—Scotch Business in the House, 283, 721

Supply—Anglo-Chinese Flotilla, 513

United States—Postal Service with the, 811

Valuation of Property, Leave, 255

BEACH, Sir M. E. Hicks, Gloucestershire, E.

Valuation of Property, 2R. 1668

BEAUCHAMP, Earl

Address in Answer to the Speech, 9

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 377

BELMORE, Earl of (Under Secretary of State for the Home Department)

Agricultural Gangs, 906

Coal Mines, Accidents in, Motion for Papers, 80, 81

Ireland—Military at Elections, Motion for Papers, 1219

Private Bills—Churchyards and Cemeteries, Standing Order, Amendt. 906

Trades Unions, 2R. 1432, 1443; Comm. 1765

Traffic Regulation (Metropolis), 2R. 274, 277,

278; Comm. 1909; cl. 11, 1911; cl. 22, 1913

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 372, 930

BENTINCK, Mr. G. Cavendish, Whitehaven

Courts of Justice Concentration Act, 725

Courts of Justice, The New, Res. 814, 818

Finsbury Estate, 2R. 321

Supply—Houses of Parliament, Report, 682;—

Universal Exhibition at Paris, 686

BIDDULPH, Mr. M., Herefordshire

Poor Law—Rating of Charitable Unions, 811

BLAKE, Mr. J. A., Waterford City

Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance, 2R. 740; Comm. cl. 1, 900, 903

Ireland—Charitable Bequests, 468;—Court of Admiralty, 1447;—Salmon Fisheries, 1915;

—Railways, Res. 1937, 1950

Tenants Improvements (Ireland), Leave, 550

BLENNERHASSET, Sir R., Galway Bo.

Ireland—Public Records, 218

Board of Trade Returns

Question, Mr. Goschen; Answer, Mr. S. Cave
Mar 14, 1806

BOWYER, Sir G., Dundalk

Counsel to the Secretary of State for India, Comm. 1327

Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance, Comm. cl. 1, 898

Ireland—The Lord Mayor's Banquet, 935

Law, Administration of the, 879

Libel, 2R. 1738

Offices and Oaths, 2R. 1107

Supply—Houses of Parliament, Report, 682;—

—Universal Exhibition at Paris, 687

BRADFORD, Earl of (Lord Chamberlain)

Princess of Wales—Her Majesty's Reply to Address, 1002

BRADY, Mr. J., Leitrim Co.

Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance, Leave, 691

Ireland—Reform Bill, 585;—Railways, Res. 1950

Metropolitan Poor, Leave 177; Comm. cl. 9, 1622; cl. 43, 1676; cl. 44, 1677; cl. 45, 1680; cl. 59, 1686

Supply—Houses of Parliament, Report, 682

Tenants Improvements (Ireland), Leave, 550

Bribery Commissioners' Report—Lancaster, Reigate, Totnes, and Yarmouth

Question, Colonel Wilson Patten; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 21, 726; Question, Captain

Gridley; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 28, 1145

Expenses of, Question, Mr. Otway; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Feb 28, 1146; Question, Mr. Otway; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Mar 5, 1338

BRIGHT, Sir C. T., Greenwich

Navy—Greenwich Hospital, 1803

BRIGHT, Mr. J., Birmingham

British North America, 2R. 1180, 1181, 1187, 1192

Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance, 2R. 744

India—Rights of the Ryots, 145

Ministerial Explanations, 1365

Murder Law Amendment, Leave, 364, 369

Representation of the People, Comm. 966, 1024

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 1568

British Honduras, Colony of

Question, Mr. Goschen; Answer, Mr. Adderley
Mar 14, 1805

British Museum—Natural History Collection

Question, Lord Lyveden; Answer, Earl Stanhope
Mar 11, 1626

British North America Bill [H.L.]

(The Earl of Carnarvon)

1. Presented; read 1st Feb 12 (No. 9)

Read 2nd Feb 19, 557

Committee Feb 22, 804 -

Report Feb 25

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3rd"
Feb 26, 1011

Amendt. "To leave out "now," and insert "this day month" (Lord Campbell); after debate, Amendt. withdrawn; original Motion agreed to; Bill read 3rd, and passed

c. Read 1st Feb 26

[Bill 52]

Question, Mr. Haddfield; Answer, Lord Naas
Feb 27, 1096

Read 2nd Feb 28, 1164

Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" Mar 4, 1310

[cont.]

British North America Bill—cont.

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Osborne), 1811; after short debate, Motion withdrawn; main Question put, and agreed to; Bill considered in Committee, and reported

Considered * Mar 7

Read 3^o and passed Mar 8

l. Commons Amendts. considered, and, after short debate, agreed to Mar 12, 1701

Royal Assent Mar 29 [30 Vict. c. 3]

BROMLEY Mr. W. Davenport, Warwickshire, N

Army—Flogging in the, Res. 1989

Houses of Parliament, Approaches to the, 888

BRUCE, Right Hon. Lord E. A. C. B. Marlborough

Parliament—Access of Members to the House, 83

BRUCE, Rt. Hon. H. A., Morihyr Tydail

Criminal Law, Comm. cl. 3, 1761; cl. 5, 1764

Education, 1158

Factory Acts (Educational Clauses), Res. 1080

Factory Acts Extension, Leave, 1280

Finsbury Estate, 2R. 323

Paris Exhibition, 894

Vaccination, 404

BRUCE, Sir H. H., Coleraine

Industrial Schools (Ireland), 2R. 1748

BRUCE, Mr. C. L. CUMMING-, Elgin & Nairnshire

Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), 2R. 674

Scotland—Representation of, 1267

BRUEN, Mr. H., Carlou Co.

Ireland—Fenian Disturbances, 334, 469; —

Inspectors of Weights and Measures, 1239; —

Release of John Morris, Motion for Papers, 1240, 1242

BUCKINGHAM, Duke of (Secretary of State for the Colonies)

British North America, Commons Amendts. 1701

BULLER, Sir A. W., Liskeard

Corruption at Elections, 405

BUTLER, Mr. C. S., Twoor Hamlets

Metropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 9, 1617; cl. 79, 1695

BUXTON, Sir T. F., Kings Lynn

Metropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 10, Amendt. 1623; cl. 49, Amendt. 1680

BUXTON, Mr. C., Surrey, E.

Army—Flogging in the, Res. 1965

Libel, 2R. 1732

Navy—Lieutenant Brand, 1144

Cabs and Hackney Carriage Trade (Metropolis)

Question, Mr. Alderman Lawrence; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 12, 280

CAMBRIDGE, Duke of (Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief)

Army—Recruiting Commission, Address for a Return, 1788, 1799

Ireland—Military at Elections, Motion for Papers, 1219

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 375, 377

CAMPBELL, Lord (see STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL, Lord)

Canada—Extradition of M. Lamirande

Question, Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens; Answer, Lord Stanley Feb 18, 467; Question, Mr. M'Cullagh Torrens; Answer, Mr. Adderley

Mar 6, 1839

Mr. Stagner, late Deputy Postmaster General, Question, Mr. Childers; Answer, Mr. Hunt

Feb 18, 479

Candia—see Turkey

CANDLISH, Mr. J., Sunderland

Church Rates, Commutation of, Leave, 285

Dogs, Duty on, Comm. cl. 4, Amendt. 1199; cl. 8, Amendt. ib.

Master and Servant, Law of, 1260

Mercantile Marine, 83

Metropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 9, 1618; cl. 79, 1696

Missionaries, Grants for, 726

Navy Dockyards, Res. 630

Shipping Returns, 1934

CANTERBURY, Archbishop of

Clerical Vestments, 1R. 1625

Office of Judge in the Admiralty, Divorce, and

Probate Courts, 2R. 1008

Capital Punishment

Question, Mr. Hibbert; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 6, 78

Capital Punishments within Prisons Bill

(Mr. Secretary Walpole, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 14 [Bill 24]

CARDWELL, Right Hon. E., Oxford City

British North America, 2R. 1174; Comm. cl. 58, 1318; cl. 91, 1319

Colonial Bishops, 337

Coolies, Exportation of (East Indies), 1258

New Zealand—British Troops in, 1934

Supply—Royal Palaces, 506

CARNARVON, Earl of († Secretary of State for the Colonies)

† British North America, 2R. 557, 582; 3R. 1017

† Church of England in the Colonies, Address for Papers, 384, 388

Ministerial Explanation, 1289

CARNEGIE, Hon. C., Forfarshire
Courts of Justice, The New, Res. 824
Hypothee Abolition (Scotland), Leave, 1088

Cattle

Compensation for Slaughtered, Question, Mr. Read; Answer, Mr. Corry Feb 15, 402; Question, Mr. Fordyce; Answer, Mr. Corry Feb 21, 724; Question, Mr. Read; Answer, Mr. Hunt Mar 12, 1702
(Cheshire), Question, Mr. Tollemache; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote Feb 19, 586
Importation of, Question, Mr. Eykyn; Answer, Mr. Corry Feb 18, 460
Plague in the Metropolis, Question, Mr. Dent; Answer, Mr. Corry Feb 8, 146

CAVE, Rt. Hon. S. (Paymaster of the Forces and Vice President of the Board of Trade), New Shoreham
Board of Trade Returns, 1806
Oyster and Mussel Fisheries, 2R. 1325
Private Bills, Board of Trade Report on, 1800
Railway Companies' Arrangements, 1704
Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1400
Shipping Returns, 1835
Stalybridge Railway Station, 1703
Standards of Weights and Measures, 465
Sugar Duties, Comm. Res. 353; Report, 450

CAVE, Mr. T., Barnstaple
Metropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 43, 1676
Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1412

CECIL, Lord E. H. B. G., Essex, S.
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1484
Weights and Measures, False, 213

CHAMBERS, Mr. T., Marylebone
Criminal Law, Comm. cl. 2, 1759; cl. 3, Amendt. 1760
Libel, 2R. 1733
Life Sentences, 1925
Metropolis—Ornamental Water in the Regent's Park, 1550
Metropolitan Poor, 2R. 753; Comm. cl. 5, 1614; cl. 6, ib.; cl. 7, ib.; cl. 9, Amendt. 1615, 1620; cl. 29, 1623; cl. 55, 1684

CHANCELLOR, The Lord (Lord CHELMSFORD)
France, Mr., Pamphlet of, Res. 1631
Hypothee Amendment (Scotland), 2R. 1141, 1142, 1222; Comm. 1428, 1432
Lds Pendants, 2R. 698
Lord Chief Baron—Petition of R. Wason, Esquire, 262, 272
Masters and Operatives, 2R. 697
Office of Judge in the Admiralty, Probate, and Divorce Courts, 2R. 1003, 1010
Parliament—Opening of the Session, 2
Recovery of Certain Debts (Scotland), 2R. 1099
Trades Unions, 2R. 1440
Trades Unions Demonstration, Proposed, 143
Traffic Regulation (Metropolis), Comm. cl. 11, 1911; cl. 19, 1912
Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 924

CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER (Right Hon. B. Disraeli) Buckinghamshire
Address in Answer to the Speech, 74
Army Estimates, 1647
Attorneys, &c. Certificate Duty, Leave, 1085
Bribery Commissioners, Reports of the, 1146
Business of the House, 149, 1370
Corruption at Elections, 405
Elective Franchise—Reduction of the Qualification, 887
Ireland—The Lord Mayor's Banquet, 934;—Railways, Res. 1949
Jamaica—Legal Proceedings against Officers, 336
Lancaster, Yarmouth, &c. Commissions, 1368, 1548
Metropolitan Cabs, &c. 282
Ministerial Explanations, 1309, 1324, 1339, 1354, 1361, 1574
Monetary Laws, 147
Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 1554
Paris Exhibition—Search of Passengers' Baggage, Res. 1694
Princess of Wales—Address to Her Majesty, 813
Representation of the People, Motion for Comm. 214, 987, 989, 1203, 1236, 1237;—The Resolutions, 337, 339, 465, 484, 1021
Representation of the People—Franchise, 467, 897, 1306;—Boroughs, 1646;—Reform Statistics, 1648, 1649, 1702;—Electoral Statistics, 1813, 1816, 1819
Scotland—Representation of the People, 1268, 1802
Sugar Duties, Comm. Res. 345
Supply—Blacas Collection, 491;—Royal Palaces, 508

Charitable Donations and Bequests (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 22 [Bill 49]
Read 2^o Mar 15, 1896

Charity Funds and Estates Bill

(Mr. Richard Young, Mr. W. E. Forster)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 28 [Bill 60]

CHATTERTON, Mr. H. E., (Solicitor General for Ireland), Dublin University
Charitable Donations and Bequests (Ireland), 2R. 1996
Court of Chancery (Ireland), 2R. 1858
Dublin University Professorships, 2R. 1131
Offices and Oaths, 2R. 1125
Tenants Improvements (Ireland), Leave, 547

CHEETHAM, Mr. J., Salford
Stalybridge Railway Station, 1703

CHELMSFORD, Lord (see also CHANCELLOR, The Lord)

Chester Courts Bill

(Earl Grosvenor, Mr. William Henry Gladstone)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 7 [Bill 69]
Read 2^o Mar 15

Chester, Disturbances at

Question, Lord Stanley of Alderley; Answer, The Earl of Derby Feb 12, 273; Question, Colonel French; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 12, 284; Question, Mr. Whalley; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 14, 344
Troops and Arms in Chester Castle, Question, Mr. Owen Stanley; Answer, General Peel Feb 14, 343

CHILDERS, Mr. H. C. E., Pontefract

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1507
 Canada—Mr. Stayer, late Deputy Postmaster General, 479
 Criminal Law, Comm. cl. 5, 1762, 1763, 1764
 Dogs, Duty on, Comm. cl. 9, 1200, 1201
 India, China and Australian Mails, 1807
 Ireland—Railways, Res. 1947, 1948
 Navy—Dockyards, Res. 637
 Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 1846, 1855
 Paris Exhibition—Search of Passengers' Baggage, 1588
 Printing—Sessional Committee, 256
 Railway Companies' Arrangements, 1704
 Railway Debenture Holders, 2R. 784
 Supply—Royal Palaces, 497, 502, 504
 Valuation of Property, Leave, 254; 2R. 1680
 Vice President of the Board of Trade, 2R. 471

Cholerine, Physical Properties of Questions, Sir Jervoise Jervoise; Answers, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Corry Mar 7, 1446

Church of England in the Colonies—Colonial Bishops

Question, Mr. Cardwell; Answer, Mr. Adderley Feb 14, 337; Address for Papers (The Bishop of London) Feb 15, 378; after debate, Motion agreed to Church Rates Abolition Bill

(Mr. Harcourt, Mr. Baines, Mr. Trevelyan)
 c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 12 [Bill 18]

Church Rates Commutation Bill

(Mr. Newdegate, Colonel Stuart)
 c. Motion for Leave (Mr. Newdegate), 294
 Previous Question proposed (Mr. Hadfield); after short debate, previous Question withdrawn; main Question put, and agreed to Bill ordered; read 1^o Feb 12 [Bill 15]

Church Rates Regulation Bill

(Mr. Hubbard, Mr. Beresford Hope)
 c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 21 [Bill 42]

Churchward, Mr., Appointment of

Question, Mr. Taylor; Answer, Mr. Walpole Mar 15, 1914

CLANRICARDE, Marquess of

France, Mr., Pamphlet of, Res. 1630
 Ireland—Land Tenure, 207;—Established Church, Motion for Returns, 209;—Disturbances in, 330, 333, 1511

CLANRICARDE, Marquess of—cont.

Privilege—Mr. R. S. France, 453
 Railway Traffic Protection, 2R. 1766, 1767
 Railways, Royal Commission on—Irish Lines, 457, 458
 Tenure of Land (Ireland), 1R. 793
 "Tornado," Case of the, 1544, 1545
 Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 377

CLAY, Mr. J., Kingston-upon-Hull

Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1411

Clerical Vestments Bill

(The Earl of Shaftesbury)

l. Presented; read 1^o Mar 11, 1824 (No. 39)

Coal Mines, Accidents in

Address for Papers (The Earl of Belmore) Feb 7, 81; after short debate, agreed to—(Part. P. No. 81)

COCHRANE, Mr. A. D. Baillie, Honiton

British North America, 2R. 1191, 1193;
 Comm. cl. 68, 1317
 Coolies, Exportation of (East Indies), 1246, 1252, 1254
 Crete—Insurrection in, Address for Papers, 421

COGAN, Right Hon. W. H. F., Kildare Co.

Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance, Leave, 692

COLEBROOKE, Sir T. E., Lanarkshire

India—The Maharajah of Mysore, 833
 Scotland—Education, 725;—Representation of, 1264

COLERIDGE, Mr. J. D., Exeter

Counsel for the Secretary of State for India, Comm. 1322
 Tests Abolition (Oxford), Leave, 296; 2R. 1419

COLLIER, Sir R. P., Plymouth

Law, Administration of the, 875

Collieries, Inspection of

Question, Mr. Edwards; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 19, 585

COLVILLE, Mr. C. R., Derbyshire, S.

Mines, &c. Assessment, Leave, 651

Common Law Courts (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 22 [Bill 48]

CONOLLY, Mr. T., Donegal Co.

Ireland—Release of John Morris, Motion for Papers, 1242

Consecration of Churchyards Bill [H.L.]
(The Lord Radesdale)1. Presented; read 1^o Feb 15 (No. 15)Consolidated Fund (£369,118 5s. 6d.) Billc. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 7
Read 2^o Mar 8
Committee; Report Mar 11
Read 3^o Mar 12
1. Read 1^o Mar 14
Read 2^o Mar 15Cornwall, Bishopric inPetition of Inhabitants of Cornwall presented (The Earl of Devon) Mar 4, 1800; after debate, Petition ordered to lie on the tableCORRANCE, Mr. F. S., Suffolk, E.
Valuation of Property, 2R. 1656CORRY, Right Hon. H. T. L. (Vice President of the Committee of Privy Council for Education), Tyrone Co.Animals, Trade in, 585
Cattle, Importation of, 460
Cattle Plague in the Metropolis, 146, 403, 404, 724, 725
Cholera, Physical Properties of, 1446
Education, 1147, 1164,
Paris Exhibition, 898;—English Jurors, 1143
Scotland—Education, 725
Supply—Royal Palaces, 505, 506;—Universal Exhibition at Paris, Report, 687
Vaccination, 404
Wales—Sanitary Condition of, 809Counsel to the Secretary of State for India Bill

(Mr. Selwyn, Mr. Buxton, Mr. Coleridge)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 22 [Bill 51]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o"
(Mr. Selwyn) Feb 28, 1203
Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Serjeant Gaselee);
Question, "That 'now,' &c."
Moved, "That the Debate be now adjourned"
(Mr. White); A. 34, N. 58; M. 24; Question,
"That 'now' &c." put, and agreed to;
Bill read 2^o
Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (Mr. Selwyn) Mar 4, 1326
Amendt. to leave out from "That," and add
"this House will, upon this day six months,
resolve itself into the said Committee (Mr.
Serjeant Gaselee); Question, "That the words, &c.;" Amendt. and Motion withdrawnCourt of Chancery (Ireland) Bill(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 22 [Bill 47]
Read 2^o Mar 14, 1858Courts of Justice Concentration ActQuestion, Mr. Bentinck; Answer, Mr. Hunt Feb 21, 725Courts of Justice, NewAmendt. on Committee of Supply Feb 22, To leave out from "That," and add "in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that all arrangements respecting the building of the new Courts of Justice should be effected under the sole responsibility of Her Majesty's Government" (Mr. Bentinck), 814; Question,
"That the words, &c.;" after debate,
Amendt. withdrawnCOWPER, EarlMilitia, The, 1545
Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 375COWPER, Right Hon. W. F., Hertford
Courts of Justice, The New, Res. 825CRANBOURNE, Right Hon. Viscount († Secretary of State for India), Stamford† Army (India and the Colonies), Motion for a
Committee, 1060
British North America, Comm. 1312
† Counsel to the Secretary of State for India,
2R. 1207
† India—Famine in Orissa, 82;—The Budget,
87;—Rights of the Ryots, 145;—Prize
Money, 146;—The Maharajah of Mysore, 835;—Coolie Trade in Assam, 936;—Contract Law, 1144
Ministerial Explanations, 1347
Representation of the People—Reform Statistics, 1649CRANWORTH, LordChurch of England in the Colonies, Address for Papers, 392
Ireland—Established Church, Motion for Returns, 210
Masters and Operatives, 2R. 697; Comm. d. 4,
Amendt. 930
Office of Judge in the Admiralty, Divorce, and
Probate Courts, 2R. 1008
Trades Unions, 2R. 1434CRAUFORD, Mr. E. H. J., Ayr, &c.
Scotland—Collectors of Taxes, 1028CRAWFORD, Mr. R. W., LondonFinsbury Estate, 2R. 322 India—Postage to, 1807;—India, China, and Australian Mails, 1809
Metropolis—Bunhill Fields Burial Ground,
211
Paris Universal Exhibition, 1801
Parliament—Access of Members to the House,
83
Postal Communication with the East, 212
Railway Traffic Returns, 212
Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1403
Sugar Duties, Comm. Res. 349Crete—see Turkey

Criminal Law Bill

(Mr. Russell Gurney, Mr. Coleridge)

- a. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 8, 205 [Bill 8]
Read 2^o, after short debate Feb 20, 678
Committee—R.P. Mar 13, 1759

Criminal Law

- Life Sentences*, Question, Mr. Hibbert; Answer, Mr. Walpole; long debate thereon Mar 15, 1918
Forfeiture, Law of, Question, Mr. Charles Forster; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 8, 148
(See Capital Punishment)

Criminal Lunatics Bill

(Mr. Secretary Walpole, Mr. Attorney General)

- a. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 20 [Bill 41]
Read 2^o, after short debate Feb 25, 993
Committee; Report Mar 7 [Bill 67]

CROSSLEY, Sir F., Yorkshire, W.R.—N. Factory Acts (Educational Clauses), Res. 1078
Trades Unions, Leave, 196

Crown Officers, Disqualification of — Draughtsman to the Treasury
Question, Mr. Serjeant Gaselee Mar 1, 1239

DALGLISH, Mr. R., Glasgow
Navy—Dockyards, Res. 642

DALHOUSIE, Earl of
Army—Artillery—Converted Enfield Rifle, 1213;—Recruiting Commission, Address for a Return, 1768, 1799
Hypothec Amendment (Scotland), 2R. 1141, 1226

DAWSON, Mr. R. Peel, Londonderry Co.
Grand Juries (Ireland), Leave, 1867
Industrial Schools (Ireland), 2R. Amendt. 1741

DE GREY, Hon. T., Norfolk, W.
Address in Answer to the Speech, 43

DE GREY AND RIPON, Earl
Army—Artillery—Converted Enfield Rifle, 1211;—Recruiting Commission, Address for a Return, 1781, 1785
Trades Unions, 2R. 1441
Traffic Regulation (Metropolis), Comm. cl. 11, 1913
Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 373, 926

DELAMERE, Lord
Address in Answer to the Speech, 18

DENISON, Right Hon. J. E., see SPEAKER, The

DENMAN, Hon. G., Tiverton
Attorneys, &c. Certificate Duty, Leave, 1064
Criminal Law, 2R. 680
Life Sentences, 1924

VOL. CLXXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

DENT, Mr. J. D., Scarborough
Cattle Plague in the Metropolis, 146

DERBY, Earl of (First Lord of the Treasury)

- Address in Answer to the Speech, 35
Army—Recruiting Commission, Address for a Return, 1785
Chester, Apprehended Disturbances at, 273
Crete—Insurrection in, Motion for Papers, 1527, 1531
Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Amendment, Notice, 808; 2R. 908, 917
Ireland—Established Church, Motion for Returns, 209, 210;—Disturbances in, 331, 338, 371, 1427, 1511;—Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, 455
Lord Chief Baron—Petition of R. Wason, Esq., 272
Ministerial Explanations, 1284, 1298
Navy—Motion for Returns, Amendt. 129, 134
Princess of Wales—Address to Her Majesty, 791
Public Schools, 1R. 80; 2R. 333; Comm. 1003; Report, 1428; 3R. 1546
Railway Traffic Protection, 2R. 1767
Railways—Royal Commission on, 457, 458
"Tornado," Case of the, 1545
Trades Unions, 2R. 1438
Trades Unions Demonstration, Proposed, 139
Representation of the People—Borough Qualification, Res. 714, 717;—Statistics, 1626;—Electors in Cities and Boroughs, Motion for Papers, 1638, 1641, 1643
Turkey—Turkish Provinces in Servia, 1888, 1890

Deslandes, Captain, of the "Anne"
Question, Mr. Guinness; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote Feb 19, 583

DEVON, Earl of (Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster)
Cornwall, Bishopric in, 1800

DEVONSHIRE, Duke of
Railway Traffic Protection, 2R. 1768

DICK, Mr. W. W. Fitzwilliam, Wicklow Co.
Ireland—The Vartry Waterworks, 1146

DICKSON, Major A. G., Dover
Army (India and the Colonies), Motion for a Committee, 1045

DILLWYN, Mr. L. L., Swansea
Courts of Justice, The New, Res. 824
Paris Exhibition, 897
Supply—Universal Exhibition at Paris, Report, 689
Swansea Vale Railway, 2R. 1089

DISRAELI, Right Hon. B., see CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER

Divorce Bills

Select Committee on Divorce Bills nominated
Mar 12, 1715

Dockyards

Resolution "That, in the opinion of this House, the control and management of the Dockyards is inefficient, and that the inefficiency may be attributed to the following causes:—
1st. The constitution of the Board of Admiralty; 2nd. The defective organization of the subordinate departments; 3rd. The want of clear and well-defined responsibility"
(Mr. Seely) Feb 19, 588

After long debate, Previous Question proposed
(Sir John Pakington), 604; after further long debate, Previous Question and Motion withdrawn

DONSON, Mr. J. G. (Chairman of the Committees of Ways and Means) Sussex, E.

Swansea Vale Railway, 2R. 1090

Dogs

Question, Sir Andrew Agnew; Answer, Mr.
Walpole Feb 28, 1148

DOULTON, Mr. F., Lambeth

Metropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 9, 1616

DOWN, Bishop of

Ireland—Established Church, Motion for Returns, 207, 209

DUBLIN, Archbishop of

Ireland—Established Church, Motion for Returns, 208

Dublin University Professorships Bill

(Mr. Lawson, Mr. Sullivan)

a. Considered in Committee; Bill ordered;
read 1^o Feb 8 [Bill 10]

Read 2^o, after short debate Feb 27, 1130

Committee*: Report Feb 28

Committee*: Report Mar 7 [Bill 59]

Considered as amended* Mar 12

Read 3^o* Mar 15

DU CANE, Mr. C., (Lord of the Admiralty) Essex, N.

Navy—Greenwich Hospital, 1803

DUDLEY, Earl of

Trades Unions Demonstration, Proposed, 136

DUNLOP, Mr. A. C. S. M., Greenock

Industrial Schools (Ireland), 2R. 1745

DUNBANY, Lord

Tenure of Land (Ireland), 1R. 800
Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 377

Duty on Dogs Bill

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer)

c. Considered in Committee Feb 15, 451

Resolution reported Feb 18, 474

Bill ordered; read 1^o Feb 20, 695 [Bill 36]

Read 2^o, after short debate Feb 21, 780

Committee; Report Feb 28, 1196

Considered as amended Mar 4, 1324

Read 3^o* Mar 11

l. Read 1^o* (The Earl of Belmore) Mar 12 (No. 42)

EARLE, Mr. R. A., (Secretary to the Poor Law Commissioners), Maldon
Poor Law—Rating of Charitable Unions, 811

Education

Copy of Minute of Council presented; debate thereon Feb 28, 1147

EDWARDS, Sir H., Beverley

Representation of the People—Electoral Statistics, 1821

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 1557

EDWARDS, Mr. C., Windsor

Collieries, Inspection of, 585

EGERTON, Hon. A. F., Lancashire, S.

Waterworks, 466

EGERTON, Mr. E. C. (Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), Macclesfield
Supply—Royal Palaces, 500

Egypt—Suez Canal

Question, Sir Henry Rawlinson; Answer, Lord Stanley Mar 8, 1549

ELCHO, Lord, Haddingtonshire

Chester, Apprehended Disturbances at, 333

Master and Servant, Law of, 1259

Trades Unions, 2R. 528

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 1580

Elections, Controverted

Chairmen's Panel Feb 19, 654

Elections, Corruption at—The Reform Resolutions

Question, Sir Arthur Buller; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 15, 495

Elective Franchise—Reduction of the Qualification for the Question, Mr. Darby Griffith; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 22, 886

(See Representation of the People)

ELLENBOROUGH, Earl of

Public Schools, Comm. 1003

Trades Unions Demonstration, Proposed, 143

Traffic Regulation (Metropolis), 2R. 278

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 374

ELY, Bishop of
Cornwall, Bishopric in, 1801

ENFIELD, Viscount, Middlesex
Metropolitan Poor, Leave, 177; 2R. 746

Engine Drivers' Strike
Question, Mr. Thomson Hankey; Answer,
Mr. Walpole Mar 14, 1807

ESSEX, Earl of Ireland—Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, 458

EWART, Mr. W., Dumfries, &c.
Murder Law Amendment, Leave, 366
Oxford and Cambridge Universities Education,
Leave, 1704, 1707

EWING, Mr. H. E. CRUM.- Paisley
Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), 2R. 678
Sugar, Drawback on, 812
Sugar Duties, Comm. Res. 352, 355, 904;
Consid. 1203
"Tornado," The, 586

EXCHEQUER, CHANCELLOR of the, 880
CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER

Execution of Deeds Bill
(Mr. Goldney, Mr. Leeman, Mr. Powell)
c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 15 [Bill 26]
Read 2^o Feb 27, 1133
Committee; Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" Mar 5, 1416
Amendt. To leave out from "That," and add
"this House will, upon this day six months,
resolve itself into the said Committee" (Mr.
Attorney General), 1417; Question, "That the words, &c.;" after short debate, Amendt.
and Motion withdrawn; Committee deferred

EYKYN, Mr. R., Windsor
Cattle, Importation of, 460

Factory Acts (Educational Clauses)
Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to extend the Educational Clauses of the Factory Acts to children who are employed in agriculture" (Mr. Fawcett) Feb 26, 1066; after long debate, Motion withdrawn
(See Agricultural Gangs)

Factory Acts Extension Bill
(Mr. Secretary Walpole, Lord John Manners, Sir John Pakington)
c. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 1, 1271 [Bill 62]

FAWCETT, Mr. H., Brighton
Army—Flogging in the, Res. 1983
Bankruptcy, Leave, 1885
Factory Acts (Educational Clauses), Res. 1066, 1087
Tests Abolition (Oxford), Leave, 296
Uniformity Act Amendment, Leave, 1510

FERGUSSON, Sir J. (Under Secretary of State for India), Ayrshire
Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), 2R.
Amendt. 662
Counsel to the Secretary of State for India,
2R. 1208; Comm. 1334
India—English Resident at Leh, 1549;—Famine in Orissa, 1646;—Straits Settlements, 1647

FILDES, Mr. J., Great Grimsby
Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. Amendt. 1138

Finsbury Estate Bill
(Mr. Ayrton, Mr. Locke)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 6 [Bill 1]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^d"
(Mr. Ayrton) Feb 13, 301
Amendt. to leave out "now" and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Howes); after long debate, Question, "That 'now,' &c.;"
A. 53, N. 87; M. 34; words added; main Question agreed to; Bill put off for six months

Fire Protection—Select Committee
Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed
'to inquire into the existing legislative provisions for the protection of Life and Property against Fires in the United Kingdom, and as to the best means to be adopted for ascertaining the causes and preventing the Frequency of fires'" (Mr. M'Lagan) Mar 12, 1708; after debate, Motion agreed to; List of the Committee, 1715

Flogging in the Army
Corporal Punishment, Question, Mr. Otway;
Answer, General Peel Feb 18, 463
Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar 15, To leave out from "That," and add "this House, reserving for future consideration when requisite the question of the exigencies of a state of war, is of opinion that it is unnecessary that the punishment of flogging should be awarded during the time of peace to Soldiers of the Army or Corps of Royal Marines serving on shore" (Mr. Otway), 1951; after long debate, A. 107, N. 108; M. 1; Division List,
Ayes and Noes, 1989

FORDYCE, Mr., W. D. Aberdeenshire
Cattle Plague, 724, 725
Game Preservation (Scotland), Leave, 1396
Scotland—Game Laws, 1145

Forfeiture, Law of
Question, Mr. Charles Forster; Answer, Mr.
Walpole Feb 8, 148

FORSTER, Mr. C., Walsall
Forfeiture, Law of, 148

FORSTER, Mr. W. E., Bradford Telegraph Lines, Government Superintendence of, 813
Trades Unions, Leave, 200; Comm. d. 2,
Amendt. 996; d. 5, 998, 999
Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 1550

FORTESCUE, Right Hon. Chichester S., Louth Co.

British North America, 2R. 1193; Comm. cl. 53, 1317
 Chester, Apprehended Disturbances at, 287
 Dublin University Professorships, 2R. 1132
 Industrial Schools (Ireland), 2R. 1764
 Ireland—Disturbances in, 400, 401, 1448
 Tenants Improvements (Ireland), Leave, 544, 555

Fortifications, Grants for

Address for a Return (Colonel Sykes) Feb 12, 288; after short debate, Motion agreed to

FOSTER, Mr. W. C.,
Staffordshire, S.

Trades Unions, Comm. cl. 2, 996

FRENCH, Rt. Hon. Colonel F., Roscommon Co.

Chester, Apprehended Disturbances at, 281
 Ireland—Disturbances in, 401

Game Preservation (Scotland) Bill

(Mr. McLagan, Sir William Stirling-Maxwell, Mr. Fordyce)

a. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 5, 1888 [Bill 65]

Gas and Water Bills

Instruction to the Committee of Selection (Colonel Wilson-Patten) Mar 1, 1228

GASELEE, Mr. Serjeant S., Portsmouth

Churchward, Mr., Appointment of, 1915
 Counsel to the Secretary of State for India, 2R. Amendt. 1205; Comm. Amendt. 1326
 Criminal Law, Comm. cl. 2, 1759; cl. 3, 1760; cl. 5, 1763
 Disqualification of Crown Officers, 1239
 Lancaster, Reigate, Totnes, &c. 1548
 Representation of the People, Comm. 993
 Supply—Universal Exhibition at Paris, Report, 688

GIBSON, Rt. Hon. T. M.,
Ashton-under-Lyne

Libel, 2R. 1738
 Railway Companies Arrangements, Leave, 102
 Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1411
 Vice President of the Board of Trade, Leave, 358

GILPIN, Colonel R. T., Bedfordshire

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1490
 Valuation of Property, 2R. 1672

GILPIN, Mr. C.,
Northampton

Jamaica—Major General O'Connor, 214;—Courts Martial in, 933
 Life Sentences, 1923
 Metropolitan Poor, 2R. 752; Comm. cl. 5, 1614; cl. 43, 1676; cl. 55, 1684; cl. 59, 1686
 Murder Law Amendment, Leave, 366
 Supply—Royal Palaces, 499

GLADSTONE, Right Hon. W. E.,
Lancashire, S.

Address in Answer to the Speech, 67
 Army Estimates, 1308;—Land Forces, 1485
 British North America, Comm. 1312
 Business of the House, 149
 Cattle Plague, 403
 Counsel to the Secretary of State for India, 2R. 1210
 Crete—Insurrection in, Address for Papers, 441
 Dogs, Duty on, Leave, 474
 Millwall Ironworks Company, 1918
 Ministerial Explanations, 1352, 1355, 1360
 Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 1852
 Offices and Oaths, 2R. 1117, 1120
 Paris Exhibition—Search of Passengers' Baggage, Res. 1592
 Princess of Wales—Address to Her Majesty, 814
 Representation of the People, Motion for a Committee, 243, 981;—The Resolutions, 486, 1022, 1236;—Explanation, 1309;—Electoral Statistics, 1813, 1819
 Servia, Fortresses in, Address for Papers, 441
 Sugar Duties, Comm. Res. 350, 1237, 1238
 Supply—Blacas Collection, 495;—Royal Palaces, 499, 504, 510
 Vice President of the Board of Trade, 2R. 471

GLOUCESTER, Bishop of
*Cornwall, Bishopric in, 1303GOLDNEY, Mr. G., Chippingham

Execution of Deeds, 2R. 1133; Comm. 1416, 1417
 Factory Acts (Educational Clauses), Res. 1073
 Finsbury Estate, 2R. 320
 Light and Air to Ancient Windows, 1243
 Railway Debenture Holders, 2R. 783
 Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1140
 Valuation of Property, 2R. 1661

GOLDSMID, Sir F. H.,
Reading

Criminal Law, Comm. cl. 3, 1761
 Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1140

GOLDSMID, Mr. J.,
Honiton

National Gallery, The New, 1644

GORE, Mr. W. R. Ormsby, Leitrim Co.

Ireland—Railways, 459

GORST, Mr. J. E.,
Cambridge Co.

New Zealand—British Troops in, 282, 1932

GOSCHEN, Right Hon. G. J.,
London

Admiralty Jurisdiction, Leave, 530
 Bankruptcy, Leave, 1880
 Board of Trade Returns, 1806
 British Honduras, Colony of, 1805
 Labourers' Dwellings—Applications for Loans, 341
 Metropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 55, 1683, 1684; cl. 65, 1689; cl. 69, 1691, 1692
 Supply—Royal Palaces, 508
 Trades Unions, Leave, 193, 194; 2R. 515; Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 995; cl. 5, 998

Government Prison Clerks

Question, Mr. Alderman Luak; Answer, Mr. Hunt Mar 1, 1232

Grand Juries (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Peel Dawson, Mr. Leader, Sir Colman O'Loghlen, Mr. Lanyon)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 14, 1867 [Bill 73]

GRANVILLE, Earl

Ireland—Disturbances in, 1427
Ministerial Explanations, 1291
Parliamentary Reform—Borough Qualification, Res. 718;—Statistics, 1626
Public Schools, 3R. 1547
Trades Unions, 2R. 1439, 1442; Comm. 1766
Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 377

GRAVES, Mr. S. R., Liverpool

Address in Answer to the Speech, 58

GREGORY, Mr. W. H., Galway Co.

Crete—Insurrection in, 214; Address for Papers, 406
Ireland—Royal Irish Academy, 1596
Servia—Fortresses of, Address for Papers, 406
Supply—Blacas Collection, 496
Tenants Improvements (Ireland), Leave, 551

GREENFELL, Mr. H. R., Stoke-upon-Trent

British North America, Comm. cl. 58, 1318
Vice President of the Board of Trade, 2R. 470

GREVILLE, Colonel F. S., Longford Co.

Ireland—Fenian Disturbances in Kerry, 469
Tenants Improvements (Ireland), Leave, 549

GREY, Earl

Army—Recruiting Commission, Address for a Return, 1793
Crete—Insurrection in, Motion for Papers, 1542
Ireland—Military at Elections, Motion for Papers, 1221
Ministerial Explanations, 1294, 1300
Navy—Motion for Returns, 134
Parliamentary Reform—Borough Qualification, Res. 710, 718;—Petition, 1890
Tenure of Land (Ireland), 1R. 801
Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 373, 929

GREY, Right Hon. Sir G., Morpeth

Cattle Plague, 403
Church Rates, Commutation of, Leave, 295
Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance, 2R. 738
Metropolitan Poor, Leave, 171
Murder Law Amendment, Leave, 367
Representation of the People, Comm. 992
Representation of the People—Electoral Statistics, 1818
Supply—Universal Exhibition at Paris, Report, 689
Trades Unions, Leave, 191
Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 1560

GRIDLEY, Captain H. G., Weymouth

Army Estimates, 213
Bribery Commissioners, Reports of the, 1145
Supply—Universal Exhibition at Paris, Report, 689

GRIFFITH, Mr. C. Darby, Devizes

Abyssinia—Imprisonment of British Subjects, 1336
Civil Service Estimates, 1995
Crete—Insurrection in, Address for Papers, 439
Elective Franchise—Reduction of the Qualification, 886, 887
Ministerial Explanations, 1351
Parliamentary Reform—Boroughs, 1646
Servia—Fortresses in, Address for Papers, 439, 932

GROSVENOR, Earl, Chester

Metropolis—Halkin Street, 465
Metropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 9, 1621; cl. 31, Amendt. 1673; cl. 40, Amendt. 1674; cl. 69, Amendt. 1689, 1694
Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 1557, 1571

GROSVENOR, Hon. Capt. R. W., Westminster

Army—Flogging in the, Res. 1978

GUINNESS, Sir B. L., Dublin City

Dealander, Captain, of the "Anne," 583

GURNEY, Rt. Hon. Russell, Southampton

Criminal Law, Leave, 205; 2R. 675, 681; Comm. cl. 2, 1756, 1759; cl. 3, 1760, 1761; cl. 5, 1762; Amendt. cl. 1764

Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act

Questions, The Earl of Essex, The Earl of Leitrim; Answer, The Earl of Derby Feb 18, 453; Notice, The Earl of Derby Feb 22, 808

Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance Bill

(Lord Naas, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 20, 690 [Bill 35]

Read 2^o Feb 21, 727

Committee; Report; Considered as amended; Read 3^o, and passed Feb 22, 898

l. Read 1^o * (The Earl of Derby) Feb 23

Read 2^o; Committee negatived; Standing Orders Nos. 37 and 38 considered and dispensed with; Read 3^o, and passed Feb 25, 908 (No. 24)

Royal Assent Feb 26 [30 Vict. c. 1]

HADFIELD, Mr. G., Sheffield

Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 76, 77

Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), 2R. 674
British North America, 1090; 2R. 1195
Capital Punishment, 78
Church Rates, Commutation of, Leave, Amendt. 294, 295
Finsbury Estate, 2R. 326
Forfeiture, Law of, 149
Mortmain, Law of, 583

HADFIELD, Mr. G.—cont.

Offices and Oaths, Leave, 117
 Religious, &c. Buildings (Sites), Leave, 1283
 Scotland—Representation of, 1267, 1268
 Trades Unions, 2R. 526; Comm. 993; cl. 2,
 Amendt. 996; cl. 5, Amendt. 997
 Transubstantiation, &c. Declaration Abolition,
 Leave, 111

HAMILTON, Right Hon. Lord C. (Vice Chamberlain of the Household), Tyrone Co.

Industrial Schools (Ireland), 2R. 1743, 1746

HAMILTON, Mr. E. W. T., Salisbury

British North America, Comm. cl. 41, 1316;
cl. 53, ib.; cl. 56, 1317; cl. 91, 1319;
cl. 145, 1322

HANKEY, Mr. T., Peterborough

Engine Drivers' Strike, 1807
 Metropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 9, 1622
 Sugar Duties, Comm. Res. 853
 Supply—Universal Exhibition at Paris, Report, 689

HARDINGE, Viscount

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 927

HARDY, Right Hon. G., (Chief Commissioner of the Poor Law Board), Oxford University

Execution of Deeds, Comm. 1416
 Metropolitan Poor, Leave, 150; 2R. 771;
 Comm. 1510; cl. 5, 1610, 1613; cl. 6, 1614;
cl. 7, 1615; cl. 9, 1619, 1622; cl. 20, 1623;
cl. 31, 1674; cl. 38, ib.; cl. 41, ib.; cl. 43,
 1676; cl. 44, 1677; Amendt. 1678; cl. 45,
 1679; cl. 55, 1683, 1684; cl. 59, 1685, 1686,
 1687; cl. 63, Amendt. 1688; cl. 65, 1689,
 1690, 1691, 1693, 1694; cl. 79, 1696, 1697;
add. cl. 1698; 3R. 1864
 Mines, &c. Assessment, Leave, 651
 Rating and Rentals, 284
 Representation of the People—Electoral Statistics, 1813
 Small Tenements Rating Act, 404
 Wales—Holyhead Union, 810

HARROWBY, Earl of

Church of England in the Colonies, Address for Papers, 399

HARTINGTON, Right Hon. Marquess of, Lancashire, N.

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1469, 1504
 Army (India and the Colonies), Motion for a Committee, 1062
 Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 1578

HAY, Lord J., Ripon

Navy—Dockyards, Res. 645

HAY, Lord W. M., Taunton

India—English Resident at Leh, 1549

HAY, Sir J. C. D. (Lord of the Admiralty) Stamford

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 1855, 1856, 1857

HAYTER, Captain A. D., Wells

Army—Flogging in the, Res. 1936

HEADLAM, Right Hon. T. E. (Newcastle-upon-Tyne)

Religious, &c. Buildings (Sites), Leave, 1233

HEATHCOTE, Sir W., Oxford University

Criminal Law, Comm. cl. 5, 1764
 Oxford and Cambridge Universities Education, Leave, 1707
 Tests Abolition (Oxford), 2R. 1426

HENDERSON, Mr. J., Durham City

Finchbury Estate, 2R. 322
 Navy—Tenders for Gunboats, 1231

HENLEY, Lord, Northampton

Criminal Law, Comm. cl. 3, 1759; cl. 5, 1762
 Valuation of Property, 2R. 1655

HENLEY, Right Hon. J. W., Oxfordshire

Criminal Law, Comm. cl. 3, 1760, 1761; cl. 5, Amendt. 1762, 1763
 Finchbury Estate, 2R. 325
 Libel, 2R. 1740
 Murder Law Amendment, Leave, 367
 Valuation of Property, 2R. 1652, 1671

HERBERT, Hon. Colonel Percy (Treasurer of the Household) Shropshire, S.

Army—Flogging in the, Res. 1970, 1974

HERBERT, Mr. H. A., Kerry Co.

Ireland—Disturbances in, 1548, 1549
 Offices and Oaths, Leave, 116

HEYGATE, Sir F. W., Londonderry Co.

Tenants Improvements (Ireland), Leave, 553

HIBBERT, Mr. J. T., Oldham

Capital Punishment, 78
 Life Sentences, 1918
 Metropolitan Poor, 2R. 756; Comm. cl. 49, 1681; cl. 79, 1695
 Murder Law Amendment, Leave, 367
 Representation of the People, 1263

HOGG, Colonel J. M., Bath

Metropolitan Poor, 2R. 752; Comm. cl. 9, 1618, 1622

HOLLAND, Mr. E., Evesham

Navy—Admiralty Steering and Sailing Rules, 809

HOPE, Mr. A. J. Beresford, Stoke-on-Trent
 Courts of Justice, The New, Res. 818
 Finsbury Estate, 2R. 313
 Oxford and Cambridge Universities Education, Leave, 1706
 Paris Exhibition, 897 ;— Munitions of War, 1232 ;—Search of Passengers' Baggage, Res. 1581, 1596, 1801
 Supply—Royal Palaces, 503, 506 ;—Universal Exhibition at Paris, Report, 683

HORSFALL, Mr. T. B., Liverpool
 Spain and Chile, 340

HORSMAN, Right Hon. E., Stroud
 Ministerial Explanations, 1861
 Navy—Dockyards, Res. 648
 Representation of the People—Reform Statistics, 1648 ;—Electoral Statistics, 1820

HOTHAM, Lord, Yorkshire, E.R.
 Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1495

HOUGHTON, Lord
 Cornwall, Bishopric in, 1805
 Public Schools, Report, 1428
 Trades Unions, 2R. 1438
 Traffic Regulation (Metropolis), Comm. cl. 11, 1911

Hours of Labour Regulation Bill
(Mr. Secretary Walpole, Lord John Manners, Sir John Pakington)
 c. Ordered ; read 1^o Mar 1, 1271 [Bill 63]

HOWARD, Right Hon. Lord E. G. F., Arundel
 Metropolitan Poor, Comm. d. 44, 1677

HOWES, Mr. E., Norfolk, E.
 Criminal Law, Comm. cl. 3, 1761
 Finsbury Estate, 2R. Amendt. 309

HUBBARD, Mr. J. G., Buckingham
 Education, 1164

HUGHES, Mr. T., Lambeth
 Sunday Trading, Leave, 653
 Trades Unions, Leave, 191 ; Comm. cl. 5, 999
 Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 1575

HUNT, Mr. G. W., (Secretary to the Treasury) Northamptonshire, N.
 Army—Military Store Department, 463
 Canada—Mr. Stayner, late Deputy Post Master General, 479
 Cattle Plague, 403 ;—Compensation for Slaughtered Cattle, 1702
 Courts of Justice Concentration Act, 725
 Criminal Law, Comm. cl. 5, 1763, 1764
 Dogs, Duty on, Comm. Res. 451, 475 ; Comm. cl. 1, 1197 ; cl. 2, 1198 ; cl. 4, 1199 ; cl. 8, 1200 ; cl. 9, Amendt. 35. 1201 ; cl. 10, 1202 ; Consid. cl. 3, Amendt. 1324
 Government Prison Clerks, 1232

[cont.]

HUNT, Mr. G. W.—cont.

India—Postage to, 1807 ;—India, China, and Australian Mails, 1808, 1809
 Ireland—Royal Irish Academy, 1602 ;—Railways, Res. 1941, 1948
 Labourers' Dwellings, Applications for Loans, 341
 Paris Exhibition, 897 ;—Search of Passengers' Baggage, Res. 1585, 1801
 Postal Communication with the East, 212
 Printing—Sessional Committee, 256
 Scotland—Collectors of Taxes, 1029
 Sugar, Drawback on, 812, 1238
 Sugar Duties, Comm. 473 ; Consid. 1202, 1825, 1698
 Supply—Royal Palaces, 498, 503, 504 ;—Anglo-Chinese Flotilla, 512 ;—Universal Exhibition at Paris, Report, 684, 688
 Telegraph Lines, Government Superintendence of, 813
 United States—Postal Service with the, 811
 Valuation of Property, Leave, 250, 255 ; 2R. 1667

HURST, Mr. R. H., Horsham
 Criminal Law, 2R. 679 ; Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 1756

Hypothec Abolition (Scotland) Bill
(Mr. Carnegie, Mr. Fordyce, Mr. E. Craufurd)
 c. Ordered ; read 1^o Feb 26, 1088 [Bill 54]

Hypothec Amendment (Scotland) Bill [s.l.]
(The Lord Chancellor)

l. Presented ; read 1^o Feb 14 (No. 12)
 Second reading put off Feb 28, 1141
 Read 2^o Mar 1, 1223
 Committee ; Report Mar 7, 1428 (No. 83)
 Referred to a Select Committee ; List of the Committee Mar 14, 1765

Inclosure Bill

(Mr. Secretary Walpole, Mr. Hunt)
 c. Ordered ; read 1^o Mar 13 [Bill 72]

India

Army (India and the Colonies), Moved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the duties performed by the British army in India and the Colonies ; and also to inquire how far it might be desirable to employ certain portions of Her Majesty's Native Indian Army in our Colonial and Military Dependencies" (Major Anson) Feb 26, 1032
 Amendt. to add "or to organize a force of Asiatic Troops for general service in suitable climates" (Mr. O'Reilly) ; after long debate, Question, "That the words, &c.," put, and agreed to ; main Question put, and agreed to ; Select Committee appointed ; List of the Committee, 1064

Central India Prize Money, Question, Mr. Harvey Lewis ; Answer, Viscount Cranbourne Feb 8, 146

Commissions, Question, Mr. Kinnaird ; Answer, Viscount Cranbourne Feb 8, 144

Contract Law, Question, Mr. Kinnaird ; Answer, Viscount Cranbourne Feb 28, 1144

[cont.]

India—cont.

- Coolies Trade in Assam*, Question, Mr. Kinnaird ; Answer, Viscount Cranbourne Feb 25, 1898—Exportation of, Observations, Mr. Baillie Cochrane ; Reply, Mr. Adderley Mar 1, 1898
- Indian Budget*, Question, Mr. J. B. Smith ; Answer, Viscount Cranbourne Feb 7, 86
- Leh, English Resident at*, Question, Lord William Hay ; Answer, Sir James Fergusson Mar 8, 1898
- Maharajah of Mysore*, Questions, Sir Henry Rawlinson, Sir Edward Colebrooke ; Answer, Viscount Cranbourne Feb 22, 827
- Orissa, Famine in*, Question, Mr. Waldegrave-leslie ; Answer, Viscount Cranbourne Feb 7, 82 ; Question, Mr. Barnes ; Answer, Sir James Fergusson Mar 11, 1898
- Postage to*, Question, Mr. Crawford ; Answer, Mr. Hunt Mar 14, 1807
- Straits Settlement*, Observations, Mr. O'Reilly ; Reply, Mr. Adderley Mar 8, 1803 ; Question, Mr. O'Reilly ; Answer, Sir James Fergusson Mar 11, 1898
- Sumatra, Dutch in*, Question, Mr. White ; Answer, Lord Stanley Mar 11, 1898

India, China, and Australian Mails

- Question, Mr. Childers ; Answer, Mr. Hunt Mar 14, 1807

Industrial Schools (Ireland) Bill

- (The O'Connor Don, Mr. Monsell, Mr. Leatham)
- c. Ordered ; read 1^o Feb 12, 296 [Bill 17]
- Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (The O'Connor Don) Mar 13, 1741
- Amendt. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Peel Dawson) ; Question, "That 'now,' &c.," after long debate, Amendt. withdrawn ; main Question agreed to ; read 2^o

Ireland

- Bishop Moriarty*, Explanation, Lord Naas Feb 27, 1080
- Charitable Bequests*, Question, Mr. Blake ; Answer, Lord Naas Feb 18, 468
- Court of Admiralty*, Question, Mr. Blake ; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 7, 1447

Disturbances in

- Question, The Marquess of Clanricarde ; Answer, The Earl of Derby Feb 14, 330 ; Question, Mr. Bruen ; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 14, 334
- Castlemartyr*, Question, Mr. Monsell ; Answer, Lord Naas Mar 6, 1418
- "Cork Herald" Reporter, The, Question, Mr. O'Beirne ; Answer, Lord Naas Mar 1, 1233
- Cutting of Telegraph Wires*, Question, The Earl of Shaftesbury ; Answer, The Earl of Derby Feb 15, 371 ; Question, Mr. Chichester Fortescue ; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 18, 400
- Fenian Prisoners*, Explanation, Major Stuart Knox ; Answer, Lord Naas Feb 22, 813
- Kerry*, Questions, Colonel Greville, Mr. Bruen ; Answer, Lord Naas Feb 18, 469

Ireland—Disturbances in—cont.

- Kilmallock*, Question, Earl Granville ; Answer, The Earl of Derby Mar 7, 1427 ; Question, Mr. Chichester Fortescue ; Answer, Mr. Walpole Mar 7, 1448
- Killybegs*, Question, The Marquess of Clanricarde ; Answer, The Earl of Derby Mar 8, 1511 ; Question, Major Stuart Knox ; Answer, Mr. Walpole Mar 8, 1550
- Martial Law*, Question, Mr. H. Herbert ; Answer, Mr. Walpole Mar 8, 1548 ; Question, The O'Donoghue ; Answer, Mr. Walpole Mar 11, 1647
- Docks in Cork Harbour*, Question, Mr. Murphy ; Answer, Sir John Pakington Feb 18, 460
- Dungarvan, The 12th Lancers at*, Question, Mr. Serjeant Barry ; Answer, General Peel Feb 26, 1030 ; Question, Mr. Lawson ; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 14, 1802
- Education Commissioners*, Question, Mr. Lanyon ; Answer, Lord Naas Feb 21, 720
- Employment of the Irish Constabulary*, Question, The O'Donoghue ; Answer, Lord Naas Feb 26, 1028
- Established Church*, Address for Returns from the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of Ireland (The Bishop of Down) ; after short debate, on Question, resolved in the negative Feb 11, 207
- Inspectors of Weights and Measures*, Question, Mr. Bruen ; Answer, Lord Naas Mar 1, 1239
- Land Tenure*, Notice (The Marquess of Clanricarde) Feb 11, 207
- Lord Mayor's Banquet—Cardinal Cullen*, Question, Mr. Newdegate ; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 25, 933 ; Observations, Mr. Newdegate Feb 25, 1001
- Military at Elections*, Motion for Papers (The Duke of St. Albans) Mar 1, 1213 ; after short debate, Motion withdrawn
- Morris, John, Release of*, Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar 1, To leave out from "That," and add "there be laid before this House, a Copy of the Opinion of the Law Advisers of the Crown in Ireland relative to the release of John Morris, lately a prisoner, arrested on a charge of Treason-felony and Fenianism (Mr. Bruen), 1240 ; Question, "That the words, &c.," after short debate, Amendt. withdrawn
- Professorship of the University of Dublin*, Question, Mr. Vance ; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 8, 148
- Public Records*, Question, Sir Rowland Blennerhasset ; Answer, Lord Naas Feb 11, 213
- Railways*, Question, Mr. W. Ormsby Gore ; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote Feb 18, 459
- Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar 15, To leave out from "That," and add "it is the opinion of this House that, with a view to affording to Irish Railways the full relief contemplated by the Act of last Session, intituled, 'The Railway Companies (Ireland) Temporary Advances Act, 1866,' it is expedient, under existing circumstances, that the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury should exercise the powers conferred on them under the fourth Section, by directing that the period within which temporary advances should be made be extended to the maximum period allowed by the Act" (Mr. Blake), 1887; after long debate, Amendt. withdrawn

[cont.]

[cont.]

Ireland—cont.

Reform Bill, Question, Mr. Brady; Answer, Lord Naas Feb 19, 885
Royal Academy, Observations, Mr. Gregory; Reply, Mr. Hunt Mar 8, 1596
Salmon Fisheries, Question, Mr. Blake; Answer, The Attorney General for Ireland Mar 15, 1915
Partry Waterworks, Question, The O'Donoghue; Answer, General Peel Feb 18, 462; Question, Mr. Vance; Answer, Lord Naas Feb 18, 469; Question, The O'Donoghue; Answer, General Peel Feb 21, 723; Question, Mr. Fitzwilliam Dick; Answer, Lord Naas Feb 28, 1146

Italy—Holy See and Russia

Question, Mr. Newdegate; Answer, Lord Stanley Feb 8, 147

Jamaica

Courts Martial on Ensign Cullen and Surgeon Morris, Question, Mr. Gilpin; Answer, Mr. Mowbray Feb 25, 983
Ecclesiastical Establishment in, Question, Mr. Baxter; Answer, Mr. Adderley Feb 18, 460
Legal Proceedings against Officers, Question, Major Jervis; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 14, 336
O'Connor, General, Question, Mr. Gilpin; Answer, General Peel Feb 11, 214

JAMES, Mr. E., Manchester
 Law, Administration of the, 881

JERVIS, Major H. J. W., Harwich
 Jamaica—Legal Proceedings against Officers, 336
 Representation of the People—Electoral Statistics, 1822

JERVOISE, Sir J. C., Hampshire, S.
 Cholera, Physical Properties of, 1446

Joint Stock Companies (Voting Papers) Bill (Mr. Darby Griffith, Mr. Robert Terrans, Mr. Vance)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 6 [Bill 3]
 Read 2^o Feb 18

Judgment Debtors Bill (Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Secretary Walpole, Mr. Solicitor General)
 c. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 14 [Bill 75]

Jurymen (Metropolis)
 Question, Mr. Alderman Luak; Answer, The Solicitor General Mar 1, 1299

KARSLAKE, Sir J. B., see Solicitor General, The KENNEDY, Mr. T., Louth Co.

Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance, 2R. 746

KER, Mr. D. S., Downpatrick

Ireland—Release of John Morris, Motion for Papers, 1242
 Offices and Oaths, 2R. 1099

KIMBERLEY, Earl of

Crete—Insurrection in, Motion for Papers, 1540
 Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance, 2R. 916
 Tenure of Land (Ireland), 1R. 798, 804
 Traffic Regulation (Metropolis), Comm. cl. 11, 1911

KINGLAKE, Mr. Serjeant J. A., Rochester
 Army—Government Powder Magazines, 812

KINNAIRD, Hon. A. F., Perth

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Leave, 294
 British North America, Comm. cl. 53, 1817
 Fire Protection, Motion for a Committee, 1715
 Game Preservation (Scotland), Leave, 1396
 India—Rights of the Ryots, 144;—Coolie Trade in Assam, 936;—Contract Law, 1144
 Scotland—Representation of, 1268
 Trades Unions, Leave, 202
 Uniformity Act Amendment, Leave, 1510

KNATCHBULL-HUGHESSEN, Mr. E. H., Sandwich

Industrial Schools (Ireland), 2R. 1743
 "North," Loss of the, 342
 Sayer's Life Boat, 476
 Turnpike Trusts, 210

KNOX, Hon. Major W. Stuart, Dungannon
 Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance, 2R. 744
 Ireland—Fenian Prisoners, 818;—Disturbances in, 1550

Labourers' Dwellings—Applications for Loans

Question, Mr. Goschen; Answer, Mr. Hunt Feb 14, 341

LAING, Mr. S., Wick, &c.

Army—(India and the Colonies), Motion for a Committee, 1056
 Railway Debenture Holders, 2R. 785
 Representation of the People, Comm. 978

LALD, Mr. J., Birkenhead

Brazil—War in the River Plate, 1233
 Navy—Chain Cables and Anchors, 1804

LAMONT, Mr. J., Buteshire

Navy—H.M.S. "Gannet" and the "Arouca," 87

Land Improvement and Leasing (Ireland) Bill

(Lord Naas, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland)
 c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 18 [Bill 30]

Land Improvement Contracts (Ireland)Bill (Mr. Agar-Ellis, Colonel French)

c. Ordered * Feb 18

Read 1^o * Feb 19Read 2^o * Mar 8

[Bill 32]

Land Tax Commissioners' Names Bill(Mr. Hunt, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer)c. Ordered; read 1^o * Feb 18Read 2^o * Feb 21

[Bill 31]

Land Tenure (Ireland)

Notice, The Marquess of Clanricarde Feb 11, 207

Land Tenure (Ireland) Bill(Sir Colman O'Loughlen, Mr. Gregory)c. Ordered; read 1^o * Feb 12

[Bill 19]

LANTON, Mr. C., Belfast

Ireland—Education Commissioners, 720

Law, Administration of the

Observations, Sir Roundell Palmer; Reply, The Attorney General; debate thereon Feb 22, 841

LAWRENCE, Mr. Alderman W., London

Metropolitan Cabs, &c. 280, 281

Metropolitan Poor, 2R. 750; Comm. cl. 5, 1612; cl. 9, 1619; cl. 44, 1677; cl. 55, 1682, 1685; cl. 65, 1688, 1689; cl. 79, 1696; 3R. 1865

LAWSON, Right Hon. J. A., Portarlington

Dublin University Professorships, 2R. 1130

Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance, Comm. cl. 1, 903

Industrial Schools (Ireland), 2R. 1747

Ireland—Waterford Election, 1802;—Railways, Res. 1945

Offices and Oaths, 2R. 1126

LAYARD, Mr. A. H., Southwark

Crete—Insurrection in, Address for Papers, 425

Metropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 79, 1695

Russia—Eastern Policy of, 1447

LEHMAN, Mr. G., York City

Finsbury Estate, 2R. 311

Sale and Purchase of Shares, Leave, 690; 2R. 1134, 1413

LEFEVRE, Mr. G. J. Shaw, Reading

Navy—Dockyards, Res. 631

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 1855

LEFROY, Mr. A., Dublin University

Dublin University Professorships, 2R. 1132

LETRIM, Earl of

Ireland—Suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act, 453

LENNOX, Lord H. G. C. G., (Secretary to the Admiralty) Chichester

Navy—Dockyards, Res. 646;—Lieutenant Brand, 1144;—Chain Cables and Anchors, 1804

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 1824, 1846, 1855, 1992

Representation of the People—Electoral Statistics, 1818, 1821, 1823

LEWIS, Mr. Harvey, Marylebone

India—Prize Money, 146

Metropolitan Poor, 2R. 751; Comm. cl. 5, Amendt. 1613; cl. 55, Amendt. 1683; cl. 79, 1695

Mexico—The Bondholders, 1547

Navy—Courts Martial, 1234

Libel Bill (Sir Colman O'Loughlen, Mr. Baines)c. Ordered; read 1^o * Feb 8

[Bill 11]

Read 2^o, and committed to a Select Committee Mar 13, 1716; List of the Committee, 1741LITCHFIELD, Earl of

Trades Unions, 2R. 1442, 1443

Life Sentences

Question, Mr. Hibbert; Answer, Mr. Walpole; long debate thereon Mar 15, 1918

LIFFORD, Viscount

Army—Patents for the Improvement of Small Arms, 807

Ireland—Military at Elections, Motion for Papers, 1219

Tenure of Land (Ireland), 1R. 804

Light and Air to Ancient Windows

Observations, Mr. Goldney; Reply, The Attorney General Mar 1, 1243

Limited Liability ActsMoved, "That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the operation of the Limited Liability Acts" (Mr. Watkin) Mar 5, 1370; after debate, agreed to; List of the Committee, 1387LINDSAY, Colonel R. Loyd, Berkshire

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 1671

Lis Pendens Bill(The Lord St. Leonards)1. Presented; read 1^o * Feb 7

(No. 6)

Read 2^o Feb 21, 698

Committee*; Report Feb 25

Read 3^o * Mar 1Liverpool, Sanitary Condition of

Question, Mr. Samuelson; Answer, Mr. Walpole Mar 4, 1307

LLOYD, Sir T. D., Cardiganshire

Wales—Sanitary Condition of, 809

LOCKE, Mr. J., Southwark

Artisans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Leave, 292
Business, Public, 1370
Finsbury Estate, 2R. 317
Metropolitan Poor, Leave, 178; 2R. 749;
cl. 56, Amendt. 1684; cl. 69, 1692; cl. 79, 1696

Representation of the People—Reform Statistics, 1648;—Electoral Statistics, 1809

LONDON, Bishop of

Church of England in the Colonies, Address for Papers, 378, 399

London Coal and Wine Duties Continuance Bill

(Mr. Dodson, Lord John Manners, Mr. Hunt)

c. Resolution in Committee; Bill ordered; read 1^o Feb 21 [Bill 43]

LONGFORD, Earl of (Under Secretary of State for War)

Army—Patents for the Improvement of Small Arms, 807;—Artillery—Converted Enfield Rifle, 1211;—Recruiting Commission, Address for a Return, 1777, 1799

Ireland—Military at Elections, Motion for Papers, 1216, 1222

Militia, The, 1546

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 928

Lord Chief Baron

Petition of Rigby Wason, Esquire (Earl Russell) Feb 12, 257; after long debate, on Question, That the Petition do lie on the Table? resolved in the negative

LOWE, Right Hon. R., Calne

British North America, Comm. cl. 145, 1321

Education, 1161, 1164

Ministerial Explanations, 1358, 1365

Representation of the People, Comm. 952

Representation of the People—Reform Statistics, 1702

LUSK, Mr. Alderman A., Finsbury

Bankruptcy, Leave, 1886

Dogs, Duty on, 2R. 780; Comm. cl. 1, 1198;
cl. 2, ib.; cl. 8, 1200; cl. 9, 1201

Factory Acts (Educational Clauses), Res. 1085

Finsbury Estate, 2R. 320

Government Prison Clerks, 1232

Jurymen (Metropolis), 1229

Metropolis—Hyde Park, 1916

Metropolitan Poor, Leave, 179; 2R. 754;
Comm. cl. 5, 1613; cl. 9, 1620; cl. 20, 1623;
cl. 38, 1674; cl. 41, Amendt. ib.; cl. 44, Amendt. 1677; cl. 49, 1681; cl. 69, 1692;
cl. 79, 1697; 3R. 1854

Navy—Dockyards, Res. 603

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 1856

Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1139

Sugar Duties, Comm. Res. 353

Supply—Royal Palaces, 511

"Tornado"—Seizure of the, 88, 1306, 1338

Lyon King of Arms (Scotland) Bill

(Sir Graham Montgomery, Mr. Secretary Walpole,

Mr. Hunt)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 21 [Bill 44]

Read 2^o Mar 14, 1867

LYTTELTON, Lord

Cornwall, Bishopric in, 1805

Public Schools, 2R. 333

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 374

LYVEDEN, Lord

British Museum, 1626

British North America, 2R. 582; Comm. 806;
Commons Amendts. 1701

McKENNA, Mr. J. N., Youghal

Ireland—Railways, Res. 1946

McLAGAN, Mr. P., Linlithgowshire

Agricultural Statistics, 461

Animals, Trade in, 584

Factory Acts (Educational Clauses), Res. 1079

Fire Protection, Motion for a Committee, 1708

Game Preservation (Scotland), Leave, 1388

McLAREN, Mr. D., Edinburgh

Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), 2R. 655,
664, 675

Scotland—Representation of, 1265

MALMESBURY, Earl of (Lord Privy Seal)

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 373, 376

MANNERS, Right Hon. Lord J. J. R., (Chief Commissioner of Works, & c.)

Leicestershire, N.

Courts of Justice, The New, Res. 826

Metropolis—Barriade round Hyde Park, 213,

1916;—Park Lane and Halkin Street, 465;

—Ornamental Waters in the Parks, 585, 1550

National Gallery, The New, 1644

Religious, &c. Buildings (Sites), Leave, 1264

Representation of the People, 1027;—Electoral Statistics, 1822

Supply—Royal Palaces, 501;—Houses of Parliament, Report, 682, 683

MARLBOROUGH, Duke of, (Lord Steward)

France, Mr., Pamphlet of, Res. 1629

Marriages (Odessa) Bill

(Mr. Secretary Walpole, Mr. Attorney General)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 20 [Bill 40]

Read 2^o Feb 22

Committee*; Report Feb 25

Read 3^o; and passed Feb 28

l. Read 1^o (The Earl of Belmore) Mar 1

Read 2^o Mar 5

(No. 30)

Committee*; Report Mar 7

Read 3^o Mar 8

MARSH, Mr. M. H., Salisbury

British North America, 2R. 1105

Dogs, Duty on, Comm. cl. 1, 1197; cl. 8, 1199;
cl. 10, 1202Master and Servant, Law ofQuestion, Lord Eloth; Answer, Mr. Walpole; debate thereon Mar 1, 1259Masters and Operatives Bill (afterwards Masters and Workmen Bill)

(The Lord St. Leonards)

1. Presented; after short debate, read 1st Feb 7, 79 (No. 8)Read 2nd Feb 21, 696

Committee Feb 25, 930

Report^o Mar 1Read 3rd Mar 4c. Read 1st Mar 15 [Bill 77]MELVILLE, ViscountVolunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 375Mercantile MarineQuestion, Mr. Candlish; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote Feb 7, 83MEREDYTH, Lord

Tenure of Land (Ireland), 1R. 796

Mersey Docks and Harbour Board BillQuestion, Mr. Tollemache; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote Mar 5, 1336Meteorological Department of the Board of TradeQuestion, Colonel Sykes; Answer, Sir Stafford
Northcote Feb 15, 401Metropolis*Bunhill Fields Burial Ground, Question, Mr.
Crawford; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 11, 211;
Question, Mr. Remington Mills; Answer, Mr.
Mowbray Mar 1, 1229Cabs and Hackney Carriage Trade, Question,
Mr. Alderman Lawrence; Answer, Mr.
Walpole Feb 12, 290Cattle Plague in the, Question, Mr. Dent; Answer, Mr. Corry Feb 8, 46Hyde Park, Barricade around, Question, Mr.
Dyce Nicol; Answer, Lord John Manners
Feb 11, 213; Question, Mr. Alderman Luak;
Answer, Lord John Manners Mar 15, 1916Jurymen (Metropolis), Question, Mr. Alderman
Luak; Answer, The Solicitor General Mar 1,
1229Park Lane and Halkin Street, Question, Sir
Henry Winston-Barron; Answer, Lord John
Manners Feb 18, 485Regent's Park, Ornamental Water in, Question,
Mr. H. B. Sheridan; Answer, Lord John
Manners Feb 19, 584; Question, Mr. Thomas
Chambers; Answer, Lord John Manners
Mar 8, 1550Metropolis Gas Bill(Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Secretary Walpole, Lord John Manners)c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 22 [Bill 45]Metropolitan Improvements Bill

(Mr. Ayrton, Mr. Tite)

c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 26 [Bill 55]Metropolitan Local Government, &c.Select Committee appointed "to inquire into the Local Government and Local Taxation of the Metropolis" (Mr. Ayrton); List of the Committee Feb 12, 300Metropolitan Poor Bill

(Mr. Gathorne Hardy, Mr. Earle)

c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 8, 150 [Bill 9]Read 2nd Feb 21, 746

Committee; Report Mar 7, 1510 [Bill 66]

Committee (on re-comm.) Mar 8, 1508; after debate—R.P.Committee (on re-comm.); Report Mar 11, 1573Considered as amended^o Mar 13Read 3rd, and passed Mar 14, 15811. Read 1st (The Earl of Devon) Mar 15
(No. 45)Mexico—The BondholdersQuestion, Mr. Harvey Lewis; Answer, Lord
Stanley Mar 8, 1547Military at Elections (Ireland) Bill(Mr. Serjeant Barry, Major Esmonde, Mr. O'Bairne)c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 14 [Bill 25]Militia, TheQuestion, Earl Cowper; Answer, The Earl of Longford Mar 8, 1545MILL, Mr. J. Stuart, WestminsterMetropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 5, 1606; cl. 9, 1616; cl. 45, 1678, 1690; cl. 55, 1695;
cl. 79, 1696; 2R, 1861
Straits Settlement, 1696MILLER, Mr. W., Leith, &c.Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), 2R. 667, 668

Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1410

Standards of Weights and Measures, 466

MILLS, Mr. J. Remington, Wycombe (Chopping)

Metropolis—Bunhill Fields Cemetery, 1229

Millwall Ironworks CompanyQuestion, Mr. Weguelin; Answer, Sir John Pakington Mar 15, 1916

Mines

Select Committee appointed, "To inquire into the operation of the Acts for the Regulation and Inspection of Mines, and into the complaints contained in Petitions from Miners of Great Britain with reference thereto, which were presented to the House during Session 1865" (Mr. Ayrton) Feb 8; List of the Committee Mar 14, 1887

Mines, &c., Assessment Bill

(Mr. Percy Wyndham, Mr. Cavendish Bentinck, Mr. Henderson)

a. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 19, 649 [Bill 38]

Ministerial Explanations

The Earl of Derby Mar 4, 1864; Question, Mr. Osborne; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 4, 1823; The Chancellor of the Exchequer, long debate thereon Mar 5, 1839

Missionaries, Grants to Question, Mr. Candlish; Answer, Mr. Adderley Feb 21, 726

MOFFATT, Mr. G., Southampton
Bankruptcy, Leave, 1882

MOXCK, Lord
British North America, 2R. 579

MONCREIFF, Right Hon. J., Edinburgh
Annuity Tax Abolition (Edinburgh), 2R. 669
Bankruptcy, Leave, 1885
Scotland — Canongate Church, Edinburgh, 1704

Monetary Laws

Question, Mr. Watkin; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 8, 147

MONK, Mr. C. J., Gloucester
Banns of Matrimony, 1800

MONSELL, Right Hon. W., Limerick Co.
Ireland—Disturbances in, 1418

MONTAGU, Lord R., Huntingdonshire
Naval Yards, 405
Navy—Dockyards, Res. 626
Representation of the People—The Resolutions, 337, 338
Supply—Royal Palaces, 500

MONTGOMERY, Sir G. G., (Lord of the Treasury) Peeblesshire
Hypothec Abolition (Scotland), Leave, 1088
Lyon King of Arms (Scotland), 2R. 1867

MONTGOMERY, Duke of (Postmaster General)
Hypothec Amendment (Scotland), Comm. 1431

MORLEY, Earl of
Public Schools, 2R. 1846

MORRIS, Right Hon. M., (Attorney General for Ireland) Galway Co.
Ireland—Release of John Morris, Motion for Papers, 1242;—Court of Admiralty, 1447;—Waterford Election, 1804;—Salmon Fisheries, 1915

MORRISON, Mr. W., Plymouth
Limited Liability Acts, Motion for a Select Committee, 1880

Mortmain, Law of
Question, Mr. Hadfield; Answer, The Attorney General Feb 19, 583

MOWBRAY, Right Hon. J. R., (Judge Advocate General), Durham City
Army, Flogging in the, Res. 1958, 1961
Finsbury Estate, 2R. 327
Jamaica—Courts Martial in, 933
Metropolis—Bunhill Fields Cemetery, 1229

Murder Law Amendment Bill
(Mr. Secretary Walpole, Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Solicitor General)
a. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 14, 859 [Bill 25]

MURPHY, Mr. N. D., Cork City
Ireland—Docks in Cork Harbour, 480
Tenants Improvements (Ireland), Leave, 553

Mutiny Bill
(Sir J. Pakington, Judge Advocate General)
a. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 15

NAAS, Right Hon. Lord, (Chief Secretary for Ireland), Cookermouth
British North America, 1091
Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance, Leave, 690; 2R. 727; Comm. cl. 1, 898, 903
Ireland—Public Records, 213;—Charitable Bequests, 469;—Vattry Waterworks, 469, 1146;—Fenian Disturbances in, 469, 470, 1419;—Reform Bill, 585;—Education Commissioners, 720;—Fenian Prisoners, 813;—Release of John Morris, Motion for Papers, 1241;—Employment of the Constabulary, 1028;—Bishop Moriarty, Explanation, 1090;—"Cork Herald" Reporter, 1284;—Inspectors of Weights and Measures, 1339
Land Improvement and Leasing (Ireland), Leave, 530
Offices and Oaths, 2R. 1111, 1120
Tenants Improvements (Ireland), Leave, 530, 554, 555

National Gallery, The New
Question, Mr. Julian Goldsmid; Answer, Lord John Manners Mar 11, 1644

Navy

- Admiralty Steering and Sailing Rules*, Question, Mr. Holland; Answer, Sir John Pakington Feb 22, 809
- Brand, Lieutenant*, Question, Mr. Osborne; Answer, Mr. Buxton Feb 28, 1143; Question, Mr. Osborne; Answer, Sir John Pakington Mar 1, 1238
- Chain Cables and Anchors*, Question, Mr. Laird; Answer, Lord Henry Lennox Mar 14, 1804
- Courts Martial*, Question, Mr. Harvey Lewis; Answer, Sir John Pakington Mar 1, 1234
- Dockyards*, Resolution, Mr. Seely Feb 19, 588
- "Gannet" and the "Arouca," H.M.S.*, Question, Mr. Lamont; Answer, Sir John Pakington Feb 7, 87
- Greenwich Hospital*, Question, Sir Charles Bright; Answer, Mr. Du Cane Mar 14, 1803
- "Greenwich Suspence," The*, Question, Mr. Trevelyan; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote Feb 25, 936
- Gunboats, Tenders for*, Question, Mr. Henderson; Answer, Sir John Pakington Mar 1, 1231
- Naval Yards*, Question, Lord Robert Montagu; Answer, Sir John Pakington Feb 15, 405
- Promotions in the*, Question, Mr. Hanbury-Tracy; Answer, Sir John Pakington Feb 14, 343
- Sayer's, Commander, Life Boat*, Question, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen; Answer, Sir John Pakington Feb 18, 476
- Ship Building, &c.*, Motion for Returns (The Duke of Somerset) Feb 8, 120; after debate, Motion amended and agreed to

NEATE, Mr. C., Oxford City

- Associations of Workmen, Leave, 299
- Criminal Law, Comm. cl. 5, 1763
- Metropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 9, 1618; cl. 44, 1677, 1678; cl. 59, 1685
- Murder Law Amendment, Leave, 368
- Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1141, 1397
- Trades Unions, Leave, 195; Comm. cl. 2, Amendt. 994, 995
- Valuation of Property, 2R. 1652
- Wales—Holyhead Union, 810

NEVILLE-GRENVILLE, Mr. R., Somersetshire, E.

Paris Exhibition, 897

NEWDEGATE, Mr. C. N., Warwickshire, N.

- Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1478
- Church Rates, Commutation of, Leave, 294, 295
- Holy See and Russia, 147
- Ireland—The Lord Mayor's Banquet, Cardinal Cullen, 933, 1001
- Libel, 2R. 1730
- Offices and Oaths, Leave, 114; 2R. 1093; Amendt. 1102, 1107
- Railway Debenture Holders, 2R. 787
- Supply—Universal Exhibition at Paris, Report, 686
- Transubstantiation, &c. Declaration Abolition, Leave, 111; 2R. 1092, 1093

New Members Sworn

- Feb 5—Richard Garth, esq., Guildford
Howel Gwyn, esq., Brecknock Borough
John Vance, esq., Armagh City
Jervoise Smith, esq., Pewryn
Charles Lanyon, esq., Belfast
James Bevan Bowen, esq., Pembroke County
Hon. George Douglas Pennant, Carnarvon County
Hon. Adelbert Wellington Cust, Salop (Northern Division)
Hon. Captain Charles White, Tipperary
Sir John Rolt, Gloucester County (Western Division)
- Feb 6—Arthur Kavanagh, esq., Wexford County
- Feb 12—Sir John Burgess Karlake, Knight, Andover
- Feb 15—Sackville George Stopford, esq., Northampton County (Northern Division)
- Feb 18—Hedges Eyre Chatterton, esq., Dublin University
Edward Kent Karlake, esq., Chelchester
- Feb 21—Right Hon. Michael Morris, Galway Town
- Feb 25—Frederick Snowden Corrance, esq., Suffolk (Eastern Division)
- Mar 4—Arthur Hugh Smith Barry, esq., Cork County
- Mar 11—Hon. Percy Egerton Herbert, Salop (Southern Division)
- Mar 12—Hon. Octavius Duncombe, York County (North Riding)
- Mar 15—Viscount Newport, Salop (Northern Division)
Right Hon. Sir John Somerset Pakington, Baronet, Droitwich

New Writs issued during the Recess

- Mr. Speaker acquainted the House that during the Recess, he had issued Warrants for New Writs—
- Feb 5—For Brecknock Borough, v. Earl of Brecknock, now Marquess Camden
For Penryn, v. Hon. Thomas George Baring, now Lord Northbrook
For Gloucester County (Western Division), v. John Rolt, esq., Attorney General
For Pembroke County, v. George Lort Phillips, esq., deceased
For Guildford, v. Sir William Bovill, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas
For Tipperary, v. John Blake Dillon, esq., deceased
For Belfast, v. Sir Hugh M'Calmont Cairns, Judge of the Court of Appeal in Chancery
For Wexford County, v. John George, esq., Judge of the Court of Queen's Bench in Ireland
For Waterford County, v. Earl of Tyrone, now Marquess of Waterford
For Armagh City, v. Stearne Ball Miller, esq., Judge of the Court of Bankruptcy and Insolvency in Ireland

New Writs issued

- Feb 5*—For Northampton County (Northern Division), v. Lord Burghley, now Marquess of Exeter
For Suffolk (Eastern Division), v. Sir Edward Clarence Kerrison, Baronet, Chiltern Hundreds
- Feb 6*—For The College of the Holy Trinity, Dublin, v. Right Hon. John Edward Walsh, Master of the Rolls for Ireland
For Galway Town, v. Right Hon. Michael Morris, Attorney General for Ireland
For Andover, v. William Henry Humphery, esq., Chiltern Hundreds
- Feb 7*—For Cork County, v. George Richard Barry, esq., deceased
- Feb 8*—For Colchester, v. Taverner John Miller, esq., Manor of Northstead
- Feb 22*—For York County (North Riding), v. The Hon. William Ernest Duncombe, now Lord Faversham
- Feb 27*—For Salop (Southern Division), v. Colonel The Hon. Percy Egerton Herbert, Treasurer of the Household
- Mar 7*—For Salop (Northern Division), v. The Hon. Adelbert Wellington Brownlow Cust, now Earl Brownlow
- Mar 8*—For Droitwich, v. Right Hon. Sir John Somerset Pakington, Baronet, Secretary of State
For Tyrone, v. Right Hon. Henry Thomas Lowry Corry, First Commissioner of the Admiralty
For Devon County (Northern Division), v. Right Hon. Sir Stafford Henry Northcote, Baronet, Secretary of State
- Mar 11*—For Boston, v. Meaburn Staniland, esq., Manor of Northstead
- Mar 15*—For Huntingdon County, v. The Hon. Robert Montagu, commonly called Lord Robert Montagu, Vice President of the Committee of Council for Education

New Zealand, British Troops in

- Question, Mr. Gorst; Answer, Mr. Adderley
Feb 12, 282; Observations, Mr. Gorst;
Reply, Mr. Adderley Mar 15, 1932

NICOL, Mr. J. Dyce, Kincardineshire

- Game Preservation (Scotland), Leave, 1896
Metropolis—Barriade round Hyde Park, 213, 1916
Supply—Universal Exhibition at Paris, Report, 688

NORMANBY, Marquess of

- British North America, 2R. 576 b

NORTH, Colonel J. S., Oxfordshire

- Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1499
Army—Flogging in the, Res. 1984, 1986

"North," Loss of the

- Question, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote Feb 14, 342

NORTHCOTE, Right Hon. Sir S. H., (President of the Board of Trade), Devonshire, N.

- Admiralty Jurisdiction, Leave, 529
Agricultural Statistics, 462
Cattle Plague in Cheshire, 586
Deslandes, Captain, of the "Anne," 584
Ireland—Railways, 459
Limited Liability Acts, Motion for a Select Committee, 1384
Mercantile Marine, 83
Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, 1387
Meteorological Department of the Board of Trade, 401
Navy—The Greenwich Sixpence, 936
"North," Loss of the, 342
Railway Companies Arrangements, Leave, 89, 106
Railway Debenture Holders, Leave, 298
Railway Traffic Returns, 212
Sale and Purchase of Shares, Leave, 690
Scurry—Mercantile Navy, 283
Shipping Local Dues, Leave, 108
Storm Signals of the Board of Trade, 1039, 1080
Supply—Universal Exhibition at Paris, Report, 690
Vice President of the Board of Trade, Leave, 356; 2R. 471
Waterworks, 467

NORWOOD, Mr. C. M., Kingston-upon-Hull
Bankruptcy, Leave, 1886

O'BRIENE, Mr. J. S., Cashel

- Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance, 2R. 745
Ireland—Disturbances in, "Cork Herald" Reporter, 1333
Tenants Improvements (Ireland), Leave, 552
Theatres, &c. 468

O'BRIEN, Sir P., King's Co.

- Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance, Leave, 694
Paris Exhibition—Search of Passengers' Baggage, Res. 1596
Tenants Improvements (Ireland), Leave, 550

O'CONNOR DON, The, Roscommon Co.

- Industrial Schools (Ireland), Leave, 296; 2R. 1749
Life Sentences, 1928

O'DONOGHUE, The, Trales

- Ireland—Waterford Election, 462, 723, 724;—
Employment of the Constabulary, 1028;—
Martial Law, 1647
Tenants Improvements (Ireland), Leave, 546

Office of Judge in the Admiralty, Divorce, and Probate Courts Bill [H.L.]

(The Lord Chancellor)

1. Presented; read 1st Feb 14 (No. 11)
Read 2^d Feb 26, 1908.

Offices and Oaths Bill*(Sir Colman O'Loughlin, Mr. O'gan, Sir J. Gray)*c. Considered in Committee; after debate, Resolution agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1^o Feb 7, 111 [Bill 7]Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (Sir Colman O'Loughlin) Feb 27, 1093Amend't. to leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Newdegate); after long debate, Question, "That 'new,' &c.;" A. 195, N. 93, M. 102; read 2^o; Division List, Ayes and Noes, 1128Ogilvy, Sir J., Dundee

Scotland—Representation of, 1964

OLIPHANT, Mr. L., Stirling, &c.

Army—Military Store Department, 463

India—Straits Settlements, 1607

Metropolitan Poor, Comm. & 9, 1618

Scotland—Representation of, 1270

O'LOGHLIN, Sir C. M., Clare Co.

Libel, 2R. 1716, 1741

Offices and Oaths, Leave, 111; 2R. 1093

Railway Bills—Standing Orders, 279

Transubstantiation, &c. Declaration Abolition, Leave, 109; 2R. 1091

O'REILLY, Mr. M. W., Longford Co.

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1479

Army—(India and the Colonies), Motion for a Committee, Amend't. 1041, 1053

India—Straits Settlements, 1603, 1605, 1646

Ireland—Royal Irish Academy, 1602

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 1856

OSBORNE, Mr. R. B., Nottingham

Army—Flogging in the, Res. 1974

British North America, Comm. 1310; Motion for Adjournment, 1311, 1312

Ministerial Explanations, 1323, 1324

Navy—Lieutenant Brand, 1143, 1144, 1238

Paris Exhibition, 890, 898

Representation of the People—The Resolutions, 339;—Electoral Statistics, 1820

Supply—Royal Palaces, 501, 507, 511;—Houses of Parliament, Report, 681, 682, 683;—Universal Exhibition at Paris, 684, 688, 689

Trades Unions, 2R. 527

OTWAY, Mr. A. J., Chatham

Army—Corporal Punishment, 463; Res. 1951, 1961

Army Estimates, 1308

Bribery Commissioners, Report of the, 1146

Lancaster, Yarmouth, &c. Commissions, 1839

Navy—Dockyards, Res. 645

Outlawries Billc. Read 1^o Feb 5Oxford and Cambridge Universities Education Bill(Mr. Ewart, Mr. Neate, Mr. Pollard-Urquhart)*

c. Ordered Mar 12, 1704

Read 1^o Mar 13

[Bill 71]

OXFORD, Bishop of

Church of England in the Colonies, Address for Papers, 397

Oyster and Mussel Fisheries Bill*(Mr. Stephen Cave, Sir Stafford Northcote)*c. Ordered; read 1^o Mar 1 [Bill 61]Read 2^o Mar 4, 1825

Committee; Report Mar 13

Considered as amended Mar 14

PAKINGTON, Right Hon. Sir J. S. († First Lord of the Admiralty), afterwards (Secretary of State for War), Drevitwich

Army Estimates, 1929, 1935

Army—Flogging in the, Res. 1930

† British North America, 2R. 1135

† Ireland—Docks in Cork Harbour, 461

Millwall Iron Works Company, 1917, 1918

† Naval Yards, 406

† Navy—H.M.S. "Gannet," and the "Arouca," 87;—Promotion in the, 343;—Dockyards, Res. Previous Question moved, 604, 622, 646;—Admiralty Steering and Sailing Rules, 809;—Tenders for Gunboats, 1231, 1232;—Courts Martial, 1284;—Lieutenant Brand, 1289

† Sayer's Life Boat, 478

PALMER, Sir B., Richmond

Counsel to the Secretary of State for India, Comm. 1832

Courts of Justice, The New, Res. 820

• Law, Administration of the, 841, 853

Railway Companies' Arrangements, Leave, 104

PARKER, Major Windsor, Suffolk, W.

Army—(India and the Colonies), Motion for a Committee, 1063

ParliamentMEETING OF THE PARLIAMENT Feb 5

The Session of Parliament opened by THE QUEEN in Person Feb 5, 1; The LORD CHANCELLOR, taking direction from HER MAJESTY, delivered

Her Majesty's Most Gracious SpeechLORDS—

ADDRESS to HER MAJESTY in Answer to Her Most Gracious Speech, moved by The Earl BRIDGEMAN (the Motion being seconded by The Lord DELAMERE) Feb 5, 9; and, after long debate, Motion agreed to

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER to THE ADDRESS reported Feb 8, 120

Appeal Committee—Appointed Feb 5

Chairman of Committees—The Lord Redesdale appointed, Nemine Dissentiente, to take the Chair in all Committees of this House for this Session Feb 5

Committee for Privileges—appointed Feb 5

Sub-Committee for the Journals—appointed Feb 5

[cont.]

PARLIAMENT—LORDS—cont.

Private Bills—Standing Order Committee on—appointed and nominated Feb 21, 719

Private Bills—Churchyards and Cemeteries—On Motion of The Earl of Belmore, Standing Order 182 amended Feb 25, 906

Privilege—Pamphlet of Mr. R. S. France—Statement, Lord Redesdale Feb 8, 119; Personal Explanation, Lord Redesdale Feb 15, 370; On Motion of Lord Redesdale, Ordered that Mr. R. S. France do attend at the Bar of this House To-morrow Feb 18, 452; Select Committee appointed Feb 19, 556; nominated Feb 21, 719; Report of the Select Committee on Mr. France's Pamphlet read Mar 11, 1627; Resolution (The Lord Chancellor) agreed to

COMMONS—

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH reported; Resolution for an humble ADDRESS thereon moved by Mr. DE GREY (the Motion being seconded by Mr. GRAVES) Feb 5, 43; and, after long debate, agreed to; Committee appointed to draw up the said Address

Report of Address brought up, and read; after short debate, agreed to; to be presented by Privy Counsellors; to be considered To-morrow Feb 6, 76

HER MAJESTY'S ANSWER TO THE ADDRESS reported Feb 8, 144

Controverted Elections, General Committee of Elections appointed Feb 8

Kitchen and Refreshment Rooms—Standing Committee appointed and nominated Feb 7, 119

Printing—Select Committee—Cost of Papers—After short debate, Select Committee appointed and nominated Feb 11, 256

Privileges—Ordered, That a Committee of Privileges be appointed Feb 5

Public Accounts—Committee of Public Accounts nominated Feb 18, 556

Public Petitions—Select Committee appointed and nominated Feb 11, 257

Approaches to the Houses of Parliament, Observations, Mr. Davenport Bromley Feb 22, 888

Business of the House, Question, Mr. Gladstone; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 8, 149; Observations Mar 5, 1370

Opening of the Session—Access of Members to the House—Police Orders, Questions, Lord Ernest Bruce, Mr. Crawford; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 7, 83

Private Bills—Board of Trade Reports, Motion (Mr. Stephen Cave) Mar 14, 1800

Scotch Business, Question, Mr. Baxter; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 12, 283; Question, Mr. Baxter; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 21, 721

Standing Orders—Railway Bills, Question, Sir Colman O'Loughlin; Answer, Colonel Wilson Patten Feb 12, 279

Parliamentary Reform—see Representation of the People

VOL. CLXXXV. [THIRD SERIES.]

Paris Universal Exhibition

English Jurors, Question, Viscount Amberley; Answer, Mr. Corry Feb 28, 1143

Munitions of War, Question, Mr. Beresford Hope; Answer, General Peel Mar 1, 1232

Search of Passengers' Baggage, Amendt. on Committee of Supply Mar 8, To leave out from "That," and add "as the Customs Revenue is now derived from an exceedingly small number of articles, the prices of most of which in London and Paris are equal, this House considers that no appreciable injury would be inflicted upon the income of the Country were the present practice of the search of the baggage of travellers at Dover, Folkestone, Newhaven, and in London suspended during the period of the French Exhibition of 1867" (Mr. Beresford Hope), 1581; Question, "That the words, &c.:" after debate, Amendt. withdrawn; Question, Mr. Akroyd; Answer, Mr. Hunt Mar 14, 1801

Vote (£50,000) for Supply Feb 20, 683; after short debate, Vote agreed to; Question, Mr. Osborne; Answer, Mr. Bruce Feb 22, 890

PATTEN, Colonel J. W., Lancashire, N.

Army Estimates, 459;—Land Forces, 1501

Gas and Water Bills, Res. 1228

Lancaster Election Commission Report, 726

Railway Bills—Standing Orders, 279

Trades Unions, Comm. cl. 5, 999

PEASE, Mr. J. W., Durham, S.

Mines, &c. Assessment, Leave, 659

Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1412

Spirits, Beer and Wine Licences, 1307

PERL, Right Hon. Lt.-Gen. J., († Secretary of State for War) Huntingdon

† Army—Corporal Punishment, 464;—Quartermasters of Militia, 467;—Medical Officers of the Guards, 584;—Artillery—Stud Shot, 725;—Government Powder Magazines, 812;—(India and the Colonies), Motion for a Committee, 1049, 1053;—Land Transport, 1145;—Flogging in the, Res. 1988

† Army Estimates, 213, 459;—Supplementary, 1233, 1308, 1309;—Land Forces, 1448, 1493, 1508, 1509

Chester Castle, Troops and Arms in, 342

Fortifications, Grants for, Motion for a Return, 288

† Ireland—Waterford Election, 462, 723, 1031

† Jamaica—Major-General O'Connor, 214

Ministerial Explanations, 1345

† Palliser, Major—Rewards to Inventors, 341

† Paris Exhibition—Munitions of War, 1232

PERL, Mr. A. W., Warwick

Small Tenements Rating Act, 404

Petit Juries (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 22

[Bill 46]

PETO, Sir S. M., Bristol

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, Motion for Adjournment, 1857

PIM, Mr. J., Dublin City

Offices and Oaths, 2R. 1125

Railways, Commission on, 404

Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1140

Plantagenets at Fontevault, Statues of the Question, Mr. Owen Stanley; Answer, Lord Stanley Mar 7, 1444

Plate, River, War in the Question, Mr. Laird; Answer, Lord Stanley Mar 1, 1233

POLLARD-URQUHART, Mr. W., Westmeath Co.

Ireland—Railways, Res. 1941

Poor Law

Holyhead Union, Question, Mr. Owen Stanley; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 22, 810

Rating of Charitable Institutions, Question, Mr. Biddulph; Answer, Mr. Earle Feb 22, 811

Scotland, Question, Sir Robert Anstruther; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 19, 586

PORTMAN, Lord

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 374

Post Office

Postal Communication with the East, Question, Mr. Crawford; Answer, Mr. Hunt Feb 11, 213

United States, Question, Mr. Baxter; Answer, Mr. Hunt Feb 22, 811

POTTER, Mr. E., Carlisle

Factory Acts Extension, Leave, 1281

Master and Servant, Law of, 1260

POWELL, Mr. F. S., Cambridge

Courts of Justice, The New, Res. 823

Education, 1160

Finsbury Estate, 2R. 815

Master and Servant, Law of, 1261

Trades Unions, 2R. 513; Comm. cl. 2, 995; cl. 5, 997

Princess of Wales, H.R.H.

1. An humble Address to Her Majesty (The Earl of Derby) agreed to, Nemine Dissentientibus Feb 22, 791; The Queen's Answer reported Feb 25, 1002

c. Address of Congratulation to Her Majesty (The Chancellor of the Exchequer) agreed to, Nemine Contradicente Feb 22, 813; Her Majesty's Answer reported Feb 26, 1032

Public Schools Bill

(The Earl of Derby)

1. Presented; read 1st Feb 7, 80 (No. 4)

Read 2nd, after short debate Feb 14, 333

Committee Feb 25, 1003 (No. 29)

Report Mar 7, 1428

Read 3rd, and passed Mar 8, 1546

c. Read 1st Mar 15 [Bill 78]

Railway Companies Arrangements Bill

(Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Cave, Mr. Attorney General)

c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 7, 89 [Bill 4]

Question, Mr. Fildes; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave Mar 12, 1704

Railway Construction Facilities Act (1864) Amendment Bill

(Mr. Whalley, Mr. White)

c. Ordered * Feb 25

Read 1st Feb 26 [Bill 57]

Railway Debenture Holders Bill

(Mr. Watkin, Mr. Alderman Salomons, Mr. Laing)

c. Ordered Feb 12, 297

Read 1st Feb 14 [Bill 26]

Bill read 2nd, and committed to a Select Committee Feb 21, 781; List of the Committee, 791

Railway Traffic Protection Bill

(The Lord Redesdale)

1. Presented; read 1st, after short debate

Mar 12, 1699

Read 2nd Mar 14, 1766 (No. 43)

Railway Traffic Returns

Question, Mr. Crawford; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote Feb 11, 212

Railways

Commission on, Question, Mr. Pim; Answer,

Mr. Walpole Feb 15, 404—The Irish Lines,

Question, The Marquess of Clanricarde;

Answer, The Earl of Derby Feb 18, 457;

Question, Mr. W. Ormsby Gore; Answer,

Sir Stafford Northcote Feb 18, 459

(See Ireland—Railways)

Railways (Guards' and Passengers' Communication) Bill

(Mr. Henry B. Sheridan, Sir Patrick O'Brien)

c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 20 [Bill 39]

RAWLINSON, Sir H. C., Frems

Army—(India and the Colonies), Motion for a Committee, 1048

Egypt—The Suez Canal, 1549

India—The Maharajah of Mysore, 827

READ, Mr. C. S., Norfolk, E.

Cattle Plague, 402, 403;—Compensation for Slaughtered Cattle, 1702

Dogs, Duty on, 2R. 781; Comm. cl. 1, 1196; cl. 10, Amendt. 1203

Factory Acts (Educational Clauses), Res. 1077

Metropolitan Poor, 3R. 1863

Valuation of Property, 2R. 1673

REARDEN, Mr. D. J., Atllone
Tenants Improvements (Ireland), Leave, 553

REBOW, Mr. J. G., Colchester
Cattle Plague—Compensation for Slaughtered Cattle, 1702

Recovery of Certain Debts (Scotland)
Bill [H.L.] (The Lord Chancellor)
1. Presented; read 1st Feb 15 (No. 14)
Read 2nd Mar 12, 1699

Recruiting Commission

Moved, "That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Return of the Recommendations of the Recruiting Commission of 1866, and the Steps taken thereon" (The Earl of Dalhousie) Mar 14, 1768; after long debate, Motion agreed to

REYNOLDS, Lord (Chairman of Committees)
British North America, Commons Amends. 1701
Parliamentary Reform—Borough Qualification, Res. 718
Privilege—Mr. R. S. France, 119; Explanation, 370, 452, 453; Res. 1637
Railway Traffic Protection, 1R. 1699; 2R. 1767
Trades Unions, 2R. 1442
Traffic Regulation (Metropolis), Comm. 1916

Reform Bill (Ireland)

Question, Mr. Brady; Answer, Lord Naas Feb 19, 585
(See Representation of the People)

Religious, &c., Buildings (Sites) Bill
(Mr. Hadfield, Mr. Bayley, Mr. Akroyd, Mr. Leeman)

c. Ordered; read 1st Mar 1, 1283 [Bill 64]

Representation of the People—Parliamentary Reform

Paragraph of the Queen's Speech read Feb 11
Moved, "That on the 25th of February this House will resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House to take into consideration the 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 45" (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer), 214; after long debate, Motion agreed to

Resolutions referred to by The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Appendix)

Order for Committee to consider the Act 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 45, read

Moved, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair" (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer) Feb 25, 937; after long debate, Motion withdrawn; Committee deferred till Thursday

Observations, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 26, 1021
Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Gladstone); after short debate, Motion withdrawn Representation of the People—cont.

Order for Committee to consider the Act 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 45, read, and, after short debate, discharged Feb 28, 1203

Petition of Electors of Wolverhampton presented (Earl Grey) Mar 15, 1890; after long debate, Petition ordered to lie upon the table
Borough Franchise, Question, Mr. Warner; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 4, 1306

Borough Qualification, Moved, "That, in the opinion of this House, in any further scheme to amend the Reform Act of 1832 and increase the body of Electors, it is not desirable or necessary that all Boroughs should return Members by the same Qualification" (Lord Campbell) Feb 21, 701; after debate, Motion withdrawn

Electoral Franchises, Question, Mr. Baines; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 18, 467; Question, Mr. Darby Griffith; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 22, 886

Electoral Statistics, Observations, Mr. Locke; Reply, Mr. Gathorne Hardy; long debate thereon Mar 14, 1809

Electors in Cities and Boroughs, Motion for Papers (Earl Russell) Mar 11, 1633; after debate, Motion agreed to

Lancaster, Reigate, Totnes, Yarmouth, Question, Mr. Serjeant Gaslee; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 8, 1548

Ministerial Explanations, Question, Mr. Gladstone; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 4, 1309; The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 4, 1309; Question, Mr. Ayrton; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 8, 1573

Rating and Rentals, Question, Mr. Bass; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 12, 284

Reform Bill, Question, Mr. White; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 1, 1235; Question, Mr. Darby Griffith; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 11, 1646

Reform Bill (Ireland), Question, Mr. Brady; Answer, Lord Naas Feb 19, 585

Reform Statistics, Question, Earl Granville; Answer, The Earl of Derby Mar 11, 1626; Question, Mr. Locke; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer, 1648

Moved, "That this House do now adjourn" (Mr. Horsman); after short debate, Motion withdrawn Mar 11, 1648

Question, Mr. Lowe; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 12, 1702

Resolutions, The, Question, Lord Robert Montagu; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 14, 337; Question, Mr. Solater-Booth; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Feb 18, 465; Question, Mr. Ayrton; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer; long debate thereon Feb 18, 480

The Resolutions—see Appendix

Small Tenements Rating Act, Question, Mr. A. Peel; Answer, Mr. Gathorne Hardy Feb 15, 404

RICHMOND, Duke of (President of the Board of Trade)
Railway Traffic Protection, 2R. 1766, 1768

RIDLEY, Sir M. W., Northumberland, N.
Metropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 5, 1612; cl. 7, 1615

ROEBUCK, Mr. J. A., Sheffield
British North America, Comm. cl. 69, 1818, 1819; cl. 91, ib.; cl. 145, 1820, 1822
Counsel to the Secretary of State for India, Comm. 1328
Criminal Law, Comm. cl. 3, 1761
Libel, 2R. 1734
Ministerial Explanations, 1824
Offices and Oaths, 2R. 1100
Representation of the People, Comm. 991
Swansea Vale Railway, 2R. 1089
Trades Unions, Leave, 194; 2R. 518; Comm. cl. 2, 994, 995, 996; Amendt. 997, 998; cl. 5, 999, 1000

ROLT, Sir J., see ATTORNEY GENERAL, The

ROMILLY, Lord
Lis Pendens, 2R. 699
Sale of Land by Auction, 2R. 700

Royal Irish Academy
Observations, Mr. Gregory; Reply, Mr. Hunt
Mar 8, 1696

ROYSTON, Right Hon. Viscount, (Comptroller of the Household), Cambridgeshire
Address in Answer to the Speech—Her Majesty's Reply, 144
Princess of Wales—Her Majesty's Reply to Address, 1032

RUSSELL, Earl
Address in Answer to the Speech, 26
British North America, 2R. 578
Habeas Corpus Suspension (Ireland) Act Continuance, 2R. 913
Lord Chief Baron—Petition of R. Wason, Esq. 257, 271, 272
Parliamentary Reform—Borough Qualification, Res. 717
Princess of Wales—Address to Her Majesty, 792
Representation of the People—Electors in Cities and Boroughs, Motion for Papers, 1633, 1638, 1643
Turkey—Turkish Provinces in Servia, 1890
Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 929

RUSSELL, Sir C., Berkshire
Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1504
Army, Flogging in the, Res. 1976

Russia—Eastern Policy of
Question, Mr. Layard; Answer, Lord Stanley
Mar 7, 1447

ST. ALBANS, Duke of
Ireland—Military at Elections, Motion for Papers, 1213

ST. LEONARDS, Lord
Church of England in the Colonies, Address for Papers, 393
Hypothec Amendment (Scotland), Comm. 1431
Lis Pendens, 2R. 698, 699
Lord Chief Baron—Petition of R. Wason, Esq. 261, 268
Masters and Operatives, 1R. 79; 2R. 696, 697; Comm. cl. 4, 930
Sale of Land by Auction, 2R. 700
Trades Unions, 2R. 1435; Comm. 1765
Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 919

Sale and Purchase of Shares Bill
(Mr. Leeman, Mr. Waldegrave-Leslie, Mr. Goldney)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 20, 690 [Bill 38]
Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^o" (Mr. Leeman) Feb 27, 1134
Amendt. To leave out "now," and add "upon this day six months" (Mr. Fildes); Question, "That 'now,' &c.;" debate adjourned
Debate resumed Mar 5, 1397; after further debate, A. 86, N. 41; M. 45; Bill read 2^o

Sale of Land by Auction Bill [M.L.]
(The Lord St. Leonards)

l. Presented; read 1^o Feb 12 (No. 10)
Read 2^o Feb 21, 700
Committee*; Report Feb 25
Read 3^o Mar 1
c. Read 1^o Mar 11 [Bill 70]

SALOMONS, Mr. Alderman D., Greenwich
Limited Liability Acts, Motion for a Select Committee, 1382
Liverpool, Sanitary Condition of, 1307
Metropolitan Poor, 2R. 769
Railway Debenture Holders, 2R. 784
Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1140, 1416

Salt, English, Admission of, into France
Question, Mr. Tollemache; Answer, Lord Stanley Mar 7, 1443

SAMUDA, Mr. J. D'A., Tavistock
Navy—Dockyards, Res. 636
Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 1856

SAMUELSON, Mr. B., Banbury
Trades Unions, 2R. 522; Comm. cl. 2, 996

SANDFORD, Mr. G. M. W., Maldon
Law, Administration of the, 877
Representation of the People—Electoral Statistics, 1823

SCHREIBER, Mr. C., Cheltenham
Offices and Oaths, 2R. 1097
Scotland, Representation of, 1270

SCLATER-BOOTH, Mr. G., Hampshire, N.
Representation of the People—The Resolutions, 465

Scotland

Canongate Church, Edinburgh, Question, Mr. Moncreiff; Answer, Mr. Walpole Mar 12, 1704

Collectors of Taxes, Question, Mr. E. Craufurd; Answer, Mr. Hunt Feb 26, 1028

Education, Question, Sir Edward Colebrooke; Answer, Mr. Corry Feb 21, 725

Game Laws, Question, Mr. Fordyce; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 28, 1145

Poor Law, Question, Sir Robert Anstruther; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 19, 586

Representation of, Question, Sir William Stirling-Maxwell; Reply, The Chancellor of the Exchequer; debate thereon Mar 1, 1262; Question; Colonel Sykes; Answer, The Chancellor of the Exchequer Mar 14, 1801

Road Reform, Question, Sir Robert Anstruther; Answer, Mr. Walpole Mar 1, 1231

Sanitary Laws, Question, Sir Robert Anstruther; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 18, 461

Scotch Business in Parliament, Question, Mr. Baxter; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 12, 283; Question, Mr. Baxter; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 21, 721

SCOURFIELD, Mr. J. H., Haverfordwest

Metropolitan Poor, 2R. 755

Navy—Dockyards, Res. 634

Supply—Universal Exhibition at Paris, Report, 688

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 1576

SCROPE, Mr. G. Poulett, Stroud

Valuation of Property, Leave, 255

Scurvy

Question, Mr. Hanbury-Tracy; Answer, Sir Stafford Northcote Feb 12, 282

Sea Coast Fisheries (Ireland) Bill

(Mr. Blake, Colonel Tottenham, Mr. Brady)

c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 22 [Bill 50]

SEELY, Mr. C., Lincoln

Navy—Dockyards, Res. 588, 648

Select Vestries

l. Bill, pro forma, read 1st Feb 5

SELMER, Earl of

Hypothec Amendment (Scotland), 2R. 1141, 1224

SELWYN, Mr. C. J., Cambridge University

Counsel to the Secretary of State for India, 2R. 1203; Comm. 1329, 1335

Servia — Turkish Fortresses in — see TurkeySEYMOUR, Mr. H. D., Poole

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1500

Counsel to the Secretary of State for India, 2R. 1206

Navy Estimates—Men and Boys, 1857

Valuation of Property, 2R. 1662

SHAFESBURY, Earl of

Agricultural Gangs, 906

British North America, Comm. 804, 806

Clerical Vestments, 1R. 1624

Ireland—Disturbances in, 371

Traffic Regulation (Metropolis), Comm. cl. 11, 1910, 1911, 1912; cl. 22, 1913

SHERIDAN, Mr. H. B., Dudley

Metropolis—Ornamental Waters in the Parks, 584

Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1413

Shipping Local Dues Bill

(Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Cave, Mr. Hunt)

c. Considered in Committee; after short debate, Resolution agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1st Feb 7, 108 [Bill 5]

Read 2nd Feb 21

Committee²; Report Mar 7

Considered²; Mar 8

Read 3rd Mar 11

l. Read 1st (The Duke of Richmond) Mar 12

Read 2nd Mar 15 (No. 41)

Shipping Returns

Observations, Mr. Candlish; Reply, Mr. Stephen Cave Mar 15, 1934

SIMEON, Sir J., Isle of Wight

Metropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 43, 1676; cl. 79, 1695

SMITH, Mr. A., Hertfordshire

Metropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 79, 1697

SMITH, Mr. J. B., Stockport

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Leave, 292

Cattle Plague, 403

India—The Budget, 86

Ireland—Railways, Res. 1948

Sugar Duties, Comm. 472

SMOLLETT, Mr. P. B., Dumbartonshire

Ministerial Explanations, 1368

SOLICITOR GENERAL, The (Sir J. B. KANE-LAKE), Andover

Counsel to the Secretary of State for India, 2R. 1209

Criminal Law, Comm. cl. 2, 1757

Execution of Deeds, Comm. 1413

Jurymen (Metropolis), 1230

Law, Administration of the, 883

Libel, 2R. 727

Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1140

Special Jurors, 931, 932

Trades Unions, Comm. cl. 5, 1000

SOMERSET, Duke of

Navy—Motion for Returns, 120, 133

SOMERSET, Col. P. G. H., Monmouthshire

Swansea Vale Railway, 2R. Amendt. 1089

Spain and Chile

Question, Mr. Horsfall; Answer, Lord Stanley Feb 14, 340

SPEAKER, The (Right Hon. J. E. Denison)

Nottinghamshire, N.

Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 77
 Controverted Elections, 206
 Elective Franchise—Reduction of the Qualification, 886, 887
 Offices and Oaths, 2R. 1093, 1122, 1123, 1124
 Scotland—Representation of, 1268
 Transubstantiation, &c. Declaration Abolition, 2R. 1093

Special Jurors

Questions, Mr. Whatman, Mr. Owen Stanley;
 Answer, The Solicitor General Feb 26, 1931

SPEIRS, Captain A. A., Renfrewshire

West Indies—Quarantine in the, 721;—Mortality in the Harbour of St. Thomas, 722

Spirits, Beer, and Wine Licences

Question, Mr. Pease; Answer, Mr. Walpole
 Mar 4, 1907

Spiritual Destitution Bill

(Mr. Ayrton, Mr. Bercsford Hope)

c. Ordered; read 1st Feb 15 [Bill 27]

Stalybridge Railway Station

Question, Mr. Cheetham; Answer, Mr. Stephen
 Cave Mar 12, 1703

STANHOPE, Earl

British Museum, 1826
 Public Schools, 2R. 333

STANHOPE, Mr. J. B., Lincolnshire, N.

Ministerial Explanations, 1369

STANLEY, Hon. W. Owen, Beaumaris

Chester—Apprehended Disturbances at, 297;
 —Troops and Arms at, 342
 Special Jurors, 932
 Statues of the Plantagenets at Fontevrault, 1444
 Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 1579
 Wales—Holyhead Union, 810;—Sanitary Condition of Holyhead, 1445

STANLEY, Right Hon. Lord (Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs), Lynn Regis

Abyssinia—Imprisonment of British Subjects, 1336
 Brazil—War in the River Plate, 1233
 Canada—Extradition of M. Lamirande, 467, 1339
 Crete—Insurrection in, 214; Address for Papers, 445, 587
 Egypt—The Suez Canal, 1549
 Holy See and Russia, 147
 Mexico—The Bondholders, 1548
 Ministerial Explanations, 1364
 Russia—Eastern Policy of, 1447
 Salt, Admission of, into France, 1444
 Servia—Fortresses in, Address for Papers, 445, 933
 Spain and Chile, 340

STANLEY, Right Hon. Lord—cont.

Statues of the Plantagenets at Fontevrault, 1445
 Sumatra—The Dutch in, 1645
 "Tornado," Seizure of the, 88, 596, 1145, 1307, 1338

STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, Lord

Chester—Apprehended Disturbances at, 273
 Traffic Regulation (Metropolis) 2R. 277;
 Comm. c. 11, 1911

STANSFELD, Mr. J., Halifax

Navy—Dockyards, Res. 615, 623
 Representation of the People—Electoral Statistics, 1821

STIRLING-MAXWELL, Sir W., Porthkire

Representation of the People, Comm. 901
 Scotland—Representation of, 1362

Storm Signals of the Board of Trade

Question, Colonel Sykes; Answer, Sir Stafford
 Northcote Feb 26, 1929

STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL, Lord

British North America, 3R. Amendt. 1011, 1020
 Parliamentary Reform—Borough Qualification, Res. 701, 719

STUART, Colonel W., Bedford

Factory Acts (Educational Clauses), Res. 1087

Sugar, Drawback on

Question, Mr. Cram-Ewing; Answer, Mr.
 Hunt Feb 22, 812

Sugar Duties

Considered in Committee (Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer); after long debate, Resolutions agreed to Feb 14, 344
 Resolutions [February 14] reported; and, after short debate, agreed to Feb 15, 450
 Sugar Duties considered in Committee; after short debate, Resolution agreed to Feb 18, 473

Sugar Duties Bill

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer)

c. Bill ordered; read 1st Feb 20 [Bill 37]
 Read 2nd Feb 21
 Committee; Report Feb 22, 904
 Consideration, as amended, deferred Feb 23, 1202
 Question, Mr. Gladstone; Answer, Mr. Hunt
 Mar 1, 1237
 Re-committed Mar 4, 1325
 Considered as amended Mar 11, 1998

SULLIVAN, Mr. E., Mallo

Court of Chancery (Ireland), 2R. 1859
 Life Sentences, 1931

Sunday Trading Bill

(Mr. Thomas Hughes, Lord Claud Hamilton, Sir Brook Bridges)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 19, 1863 [Bill 34]

SUPPLY

Queen's Speech considered Feb 7; Motion, "That a Supply be granted to Her Majesty" Committee on Motion, "That a Supply be granted to Her Majesty;" Queen's Speech referred; Motion considered Feb 8; Resolved, "That a Supply be granted to Her Majesty"—Resolution reported, and agreed to Nem. Con. Feb 11

Committee appointed for Wednesday

Considered in Committee Feb 18—SUPPLEMENTARY CIVIL SERVICES 1866-7—(1.) £45,721, Purchase of the Blacas Collection of Coins and Antiquities for the British Museum; after debate, Vote agreed to.—(2.) £165,309, Royal Palaces; after debate, Vote agreed to.—(3.) £101,300, Anglo-Chinese Flotilla; after short debate, Vote agreed to—Resolutions reported

Vote £600, Houses of Parliament Feb 20, 1861; after short debate, Vote agreed to Vote £50,000, Universal Exhibition at Paris, 1863; after short debate, Vote agreed to—Resolutions agreed to

Considered in Committee—EXCESSES ON GRANTS—£56,788 5s. 6d., for sums to make good Excesses on Grants for certain Civil Services Mar 1, 1871—Resolution agreed to

Considered in Committee—ARMY ESTIMATES—139,163, Land Forces (including 9,778 all Ranks, to be employed with the depôts in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland of Regiments serving in Her Majesty's Indian Possessions)—Statement of the Secretary of State for War (General Peel) Mar 7, 1848; after long debate, Vote agreed to

Considered in Committee—NAVY ESTIMATES—Statement of the Secretary of the Navy (Lord Henry Lennox) in moving the First Resolution, "That 67,300 Men and Boys be employed for the Sea and Coast Guard Services, for the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1868, including 16,300 Royal Marines" Mar 14, 1824; after long debate, Committee—R.F.

Considered in Committee—ARMY ESTIMATES (on account) Mar 15, 1891.—NAVY ESTIMATES—(28.) £1,000,000, Wages, &c., to Seamen and Marines (on account), 1892; after short debate, Vote agreed to.—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES (on account)—That a sum, not exceeding £1,924,000 be granted to Her Majesty, on account, for or towards defraying the Charge of the following Civil Services, to the 31st day of March, 1868, 1892; Vote agreed to

Swansea Vale Railway Bill

c. Read 2^o, after short debate Feb 27, 1869

SYKES, Colonel W. H., Aberdeen City

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1866
Artisans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Leave, 203
British North America, Comm. 1812

[cont.]

SYKES, Colonel W. H.—cont.

Education, 1163

Fortifications, Grants for, Motion for a Return, 268

Meteorological Department of the Board of Trade, 401

Navy—Dockyards, Res. 643

Oxford and Cambridge Universities Education, Leave, 1707

Scotland—Representation of the People, 1801

Storm Signals of the Board of Trade, 1029

Supply—Royal Palaces, 500, 506;—Anglo-Chinese Flotilla, 512

SYMAN, Mr. E. J., Limerick Co.

Industrial Schools (Ireland), 2R. 1746

Ireland—Railways, Res. 1948

Libel, 2R. 1740

TAUNTON, Lord

Church of England in the Colonies, Address for Papers, 388, 393

France, Mr., Pamphlet of, Res. 1628

TAYLOR, Mr. P. A., Leicester

Churchward, Mr., Appointment of, 1914, 1915

Telegraph Lines, Government Superintendence of

Question, Mr. W. E. Forster; Answer, Mr. Hunt Feb 22, 813

Tenants Improvements (Ireland) Bill

(Lord Naas, Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 18, 1830 [Bill 29]

Tenure of Land (Ireland) Bill

(The Marquess of Clanricarde)

l. Presented; read 1^o Feb 22, 793 (No. 23)

Tests Abolition (Oxford) Bill

(Mr. Coleridge, Mr. Grant Duff)

c. Considered in Committee; Resolution agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1^o Feb 12, 296

Read 2^o Mar 6, 1419 [Bill 16]

Thames Embankment and Metropolis Improvement [Loans] Bill

(Mr. Dodson, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer)

c. Ordered Feb 22

Read 1^o Feb 26 [Bill 56]

Theatres, &c.

Question, Mr. O'Beirne; Answer, Mr. Walpole; Feb 18, 468

TOLLEMACHE, Mr. J., Cheshire S.

Cattle Plague in Cheshire, 586

Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, 1836

Salt, Admission of, into France, 1448

"Tornado," Seizure of the, by the Spanish Authorities

Question, Mr. Alderman Lusk; Answer, Lord Stanley Feb 7, 88; Question, Mr. Crum-Ewing; Answer, Lord Stanley Feb 19, 588;
Question, Mr. Hanbury-Tracy; Answer, Lord
Stanley Feb 28, 1145; Question, Mr. Alderman Lusk; Answer, Lord Stanley Mar 4, 1806; Question, Mr. Alderman Lusk; Answer, Lord Stanley Mar 5, 1838; Postponement of Motion, The Marquess of Clanricarde Mar 8, 1844

TORRENS, Mr. W. T. McCullagh, Finsbury
Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings, Leave, 290
Canada—Extradition of M. Lamirande, 467
1839
Metropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 9, 1615

TRACY, Hon. C. R. D. HANBURY-, Montgomery

Navy—Promotions in the, 343
Scurvy, Mercantile Navy, 282
"Tornado," The, 1145

Trades Unions Bill (Mr. Secretary Walpole, Lord John Manners, Sir Stafford Northcote)

c. Ordered Feb 8, 179 [Bill 18]
Read 1^o Feb 12
Read 2^o Feb 18, 518
Committee; Report Feb 25, 993 [Bill 58]
Committee Feb 26
Considered Feb 28
Read 3^o Mar 1
l. Read 1^o (The Earl of Belmore) Mar 4
Read 2^o Mar 7, 1432 (No. 31)
Committee; Report Mar 14, 1765 (No. 44)

Trades Unions Demonstration

Question, The Earl of Dudley; Answer, The Earl of Derby; short debate thereon Feb 8, 186

Traffic Regulation (Metropolis) Bill
(The Earl of Belmore)

l. Presented; read 1^o Feb 7 (No. 5)
Read 2^o, and referred to a Select Committee
Feb 12, 274; List of the Committee, 278
Report Mar 8
Committee Mar 15, 1909 (No. 46)

Transubstantiation, &c., Declaration Abolition Bill

(Sir C. O'Loughlin, Mr. Cogan, Sir J. Gray)
c. Committee, after short debate; Resolution agreed to; Bill ordered; read 1^o Feb 7,
109 [Bill 6]
Read 2^o Feb 27, 1091

TREVELYAN, Mr. G. O., Tynemouth
Factory Acts (Educational Clauses), Res.
1074
Navy—The "Greenwich Sirpence," 936

Turkey

Crete, Affairs of, Question, Sir Harry Verney;
Answer, Lord Stanley Feb 19, 587—Insurrection in, Question, Mr. Gregory; Answer,
Lord Stanley Feb 11, 214; Motion for Papers
(The Duke of Argyll) Mar 8, 1512; after long debate, Motion withdrawn
Servia—Amend. on Committee of Supply
Feb 15, To leave out from "That," and add "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of any Correspondence between the Foreign Office and Foreign Governments on the subject of the insurrection in Crete and the Turkish Fortresses in Servia; and of any Reports from our Consular Agents on these subjects" (Mr. Gregory), 406; Question, "That the words,
&c.;" Amend. and Motion withdrawn
Servia—Evacuation of the Fortresses, Que-sition, Mr. Darby Griffith; Answer, Lord
Stanley Feb 25, 932; Notice of Motion
(Earl Russell) withdrawn Mar 15, 1888

Turnpike Trusts

Question, Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen; Answer,
Mr. Walpole Feb 11, 210

Uniformity Act Amendment Bill
(Mr. Fawcett, Mr. Bowyer)

c. Resolution in Committee; Bill ordered; read 1^o
Mar 7, 1510 [Bill 68]

Vaccination

Question, Mr. Bruce; Answer, Mr. Corry
Feb 15, 404

Valuation of Property Bill

(Mr. Hunt, Mr. Secretary Walpole, Mr.
Gathorne Haray)

c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 11, 250 [Bill 19]
Read 2^o, and committed to a Select Committee; List of the Committee Mar 11, 1673

VANCE, Mr. J., Armagh City

Bankruptcy, Leave, 1886
Ireland—Professorship of Dublin University,
146;—Vartry Waterworks, 469
Offices and Oaths, 2R. 1127

VANDERBYL, Mr. P., Bridgwater

Metropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 9, 1620; cl. 43,
Amend. 1675, 1676

VERNEY, Sir H., Buckingham

Crete—Affairs of, 587
Metropolitan Poor, 2R. 753; Comm. cl. 5,
1612; cl. 9, 1622; cl. 29, Amend. 1623;
cl. 43, 1676; cl. 59, 1686; cl. 69, 1692;
Amend. 1693; 3R. 1662

VERULAM, Earl of

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 375

Vice President of the Board of Trade Bill
(Sir Stafford Northcote, Mr. Cave, Mr. Hunt)
c. Ordered; read 1^o Feb 14, 356 [Bill 22]
Read 2^o Feb 18, 470

VILLIERS, Right Hon. C. P. Wolver-hampton
Metropolitan Poor, 2R. * Appendix, 1; Comm.
cl. 5, 1611, 1614; cl. 9, 1616, 1620, 1622,
cl. 41, 1675; cl. 44, 1677; cl. 55, 1684;
cl. 59, 1687; cl. 69, 1695
Valuation of Property, 2R.; * Appendix 8

VIVIAN, Lord
Cornwall, Bishopric in, 1303
Ireland—Military at Elections, Motion for Papers, 1222
Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 371, 372

VIVIAN, Hon. Captain J. C. W., Truro
Army Estimates, 1308;—Land Forces, 1497,
1647;—Supplementary, 1233
Army—(India and the Colonies), Motion for a Select Committee, 1054;—Land Transport, 1144;—Flogging in the, Res. 1966, 1986 Representation of the People—Electoral Statistics, 1823

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances

Question, Lord Vivian; Answer, The Earl of Belmore; debate thereon Feb 15, 371; Observations, Lord St. Leonards; Reply, Earl
De Grey and Ripon; debate thereon Feb 25,
919; Observations, Mr. W. E. Forster,
1550; Reply, Mr. Walpole; debate thereon
Mar 8, 1562; Observations, Mr. Thomas
Hughes; Reply, The Attorney General;
short debate thereon Mar 8, 1575

WALDEGRAVE-LESLIE, Hon. G., Hastings
Counsel to the Secretary of State for India, 2R.
1208
Gas and Water Bills, Res. 1228
India—Famine in Orissa, 82

Wales

Sanitary Condition of, Question, Sir Thomas
Lloyd; Answer, Mr. Corry Feb 22, 809
Poor Law—Holyhead Union, Question, Mr.
Owen Stanley; Answer, Mr. Gathorne
Hardy Feb 22, 810
Sanitary State of Holyhead, Question, Mr. Owen
Stanley; Answer, Mr. Walpole Mar 7, 1445

WALKER, Major G. G., Dumfriesshire
Army—Quartermasters of Militia, 467

WALPOLE, Right Hon. S. H., (Secretary of State for the Home Department) Cambridge University
Address in Answer to the Speech, Report, 77
Associations of Workmen, Leave, 300
Capital Punishment, 78
Capital Punishments within Prisons, Leave, 359

VOL. CLXXXV. [THIRD SERIES.] [cont.]

WALPOLE, Right Hon. S. H.—cont.

Chester—Apprehended Disturbances at, 284,
287, 344
Churchward, Mr., Appointment of, 1914, 1915
Cholera, Physical Qualities of, 1446
Collieries, Inspection of, 585
Counsel to the Secretary of State for India, 2R.
1206
Court of Chancery (Ireland), 2R. 1860
Criminal Law, 2R. 681
Criminal Lunatics, 2R. 993
Dogs, Duty on, 1143
Education, 1164
Engine Drivers' Strike, 1807
Factory Acts (Educational Clauses), Res. 1089
Factory Acts Extension, Leave, 1271, 1280, 1282
Forfeiture, Law of, 149
Hours of Labour Regulation, Leave, 1271
Industrial Schools (Ireland), 2R. 1755
Ireland—Professorship of Dublin University,
147;—Disturbances in, 335, 336, 400, 401,
1448, 1549, 1550;—Martial Law, 1647
Lancaster Election Commission Report, 726
Libel, 2R. 1741
Life Sentences, 1928
Liverpool, Sanitary Condition of, 1307
Master and Servant, Law of, 1261
Metropolis—Bunhill Fields Burial Ground,
211
Metropolitan Cabs, &c. 280
Murder Law Amendment, Leave, 359, 369
Parliament—Access of Members to the House,
85
Railways, Commission on, 404
Representation of the People, Comm. 974
Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1141
Scotland—Scotch Business in the House, 283,
721;—Sanitary Laws, 461;—Poor Law,
586;—Game Laws, 1145;—Road Reform,
1231;—Canongate Church, Edinburgh, 1704
Spirits, Beer and Wine Licenses, 1307
Supply—Houses of Parliament, Report, 682;—
Universal Exhibition at Paris, 687
Theatres, &c. 468
Trades Unions, Leave, 179, 193, 194, 203; 2R.
523, 529; Comm. cl. 2, 994; Amendt. 996;
cl. 5, 999
Transubstantiation, &c. Declaration Abolition,
Leave, 110, 111
Turnpike Trusts, 211
Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 1562, 1569
Wales—Sanitary State of Holyhead, 1445
Weights and Measures, False, 213
Wolverhampton, Riots at, 1031

WARNER, Mr. E., Norwich

Representation of the People, Comm. 999;—
Borough Franchise, 1806

Waterworks Bill

Question, Mr. A. Egerton; Answer, Sir Stafford
Northcote Feb 18, 466

WATKIN, Mr. E. W., Stockport

British North America, 2R. 1187
Limited Liability Acts, Motion for a Committee, 1370
Monetary Laws, 147

WATKIN, Mr. E. W.—cont.

Paris Exhibition—Search of Passengers' Baggage, Res. 1590
Railway Companies Arrangements, Leave, 100
Railway Debenture Holders, Leave, 297; 2R. 781, 790
Supply—Royal Palaces, 507, 511
Trades Unions, 2R. 514; Comm. cl. 2, 995

WAYS AND MEANS

Resolution in Committee; Consolidated Fund (£369,118 ss. 6d.) Mar 6, 1427
Bill ordered (Mr. Dodson, Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Hunt); read 1st Mar 7

WEGUELIN, Mr. T. M., Wolverhampton
Millwall Iron Works Company, 1916, 1917
Sale and Purchase of Shares, 2R. 1409

Weights and Measures, False

Question, Lord Eustace Cecil; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 11, 213

Weights and Measures, Standards of

Question, Mr. Miller; Answer, Mr. Stephen Cave Feb 18, 466

West Indies—Mortality in the Harbour of St. Thomas

Question, Captain Speirs; Answer, Mr. Ad-derley Feb 21, 722 — Quarantine in the, Question, Captain Speirs; Answer, Mr. Ad-derley Feb 21, 721

WESTMERE, Marquess of

Traffic Regulation (Metropolis), Comm. cl. 19, Amendt. 1912

WHALLEY, Mr. G. H., Peterborough

Chester, Disturbances at, 344
Counsel to the Secretary of State for India, 2R. 1209
Factory Acts (Educational Clauses), Res. 1086

[cont.]

WHALLEY, Mr. G. H.—cont.

Offices and Oaths, Leave, 117; 2R. 1121, 1122, 1123, 1124
Trades Unions, Leave, 202
Wolverhampton, Riots at, 1031, 1032

WHARNCIFFE, Lord

Coal Mines, Accidents in, Motion for Papers, 60
Cornwall, Bishopric in, 1304
Trades Unions, 2R. 1437, 1438, 1439

WHATMAN, Mr. J., Maidstone

Special Jurors, 931

WHITEREAD Mr. S., Bedford

Army Estimates—Land Forces, 1491
Army—Flogging in the, Res. 1938

WHITE, Mr. J., Brighton

Counsel to the Secretary of State for India, 2R. 1205; Motion for Adjournment, 1209
Representation of the People, 1235;—Electoral Statistics, 1815
Sumatra—The Dutch in, 1645

WILLIAMSON, Sir H., Durham, N.

Volunteers, Employment of, in Civil Disturbances, 1580

Wolverhampton, Riot at

Question, Mr. Whalley; Answer, Mr. Walpole Feb 26, 1031

WYLD, Mr. J., Bodmin

Metropolitan Poor, Comm. cl. 79, 1697
Supply—Royal Palaces, 509

WYNDHAM, Hon. P. S., Cumberland, W.

Metropolitan Poor, Comm. add. cl. 1697
Mines, &c. Assessment, Leave, 649

YORK, Archbishop of

Church of England in the Colonies, Address for Papers, 395

ERRATUM.

Page 477, line 27, for formed read favoured.

END OF VOLUME CLXXXV., AND FIRST VOLUME OF THE SESSION 1867.

